been thoroughly routed and the night was still young.

Moreover Jake Jacobson decided shrewdly enough that it would be wiser, in the circumstances, to get the lighting in the tomb dismantled before there could be any question of Government inspection. Talk there was bound to be; better that the officials should find nothing to talk about.

The moonlight picnic would serve as a cover for the removal of the wrappings.

"Oh, come, Jake; you can't ask those poor beggars of electricians to take on another job of work to-night." Lovelace protested good-naturedly. "Remember they did all the dirty work while we were bungled up in that infernal passage."

"I'm quite willing to tackle it," Mac interrupted brusquely. His Scottish accent more pronounced than ever. His features did not seem to have suffered so much as those of Hawkins, but there was a nasty cut over one eyebrow and his knuckles were bruised and bleeding.

"So 'n' I, the cockney chimed in gamely. "Specially if there's a spot of champagne going afterwards."

"A bottle apiece my sons," Jacobson promised and the two electricians disappeared once more into the tomb.

To Kay the hilarious, irresponsible meal which followed in a hollow of the sandhills had an altogether unreal quality like the desert moonlight itself.

It might have been another scene in the film; perhaps it was she found herself thinking vaguely.

She was too overtired and excited to eat; the half-glass of champagne Zenda and the other urged her to drink only increased the dizzy lightness in her head, but it took away all sense of bodily weariness, so that Kay felt very wide awake, very much alive.

She stood waiting for Zenda, who had suggested that they should ride back together—but Zenda seemed to have vanished.

It was not she who came noiselessly up behind Kay, no woman's voice that spoke softly.

"Will you walk back with me, Kay? It's such a perfect night and I know a short cut that takes us into the hotel gardens. But of course, if you'd rather not—if you'd prefer to go with someone else, I'll understand. It doesn't matter."

There seemed none of Lovelace's usual self-confidence in the low voice; perhaps for that very reason Kay answered as she did, after the first moment's hesitation.

"Yes, I'll come."

Speak; after a while that silence got on her nerves and she caught at the first subject that offered itself, hoping that her voice sounded casual, unconcerned.

"I thought you said that this was a short cut to the hotel? It seems to me that it's much farther than the usual way!"

"Perhaps I shouldn't have called it short, but we'll get back to the hotel... in time. Are you in a hurry?"

"Well, it has been rather a tiring evening. I shan't be exactly sorry to get to bed and—and I think the champagne's gone to my head a bit," Kay laughed. "I'm not used to it, you see, even in half glasses."

In Memoriam

MR. JAMES ALBERT CREED

The death occurred on March 28th at the King's County Memorial Hospital of James Albert Creed, age 2 months, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. James W. Creed, Albion, P. E. I. The sympathy of the whole community goes out to the bereaved parents. God had lent them an angel for a short time to love, and then He called it home.

For He said, suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

A little baby is the joy of the home as this little boy was seemingly a big healthy child, then he took sick. All that medical skill could do was done but with no success; he gradually sank and entered safe in the arms of Jesus.

He leaves to mourn his parents, two brothers, Spencer and Stanley, one sister, Helen.

His funeral was held in the Sturgeon Baptist Church and was conducted by Rev. Sydney J. Boyce and was largely attended. The choir sang "When He Cometh," "Beckoning Hands," and "Safe In the Arms of Jesus."

The pallbearers were: Angus Moore, LeRoy Wright, Douglas Sorrie, Willie Jessome. Mr. Ernest Griffin drove the little remains which were laid to rest in the church cemetery.

Sleep On Sweet Babe, and Take Thy Rest.

CARD OF THANKS

Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Creed wish to express their sincere thanks to the friends and neighbors for their kindness; also Dr. Preston McIntyre and Nurses of King's County Memorial Hospital, during their recent bereavement.
