Working hand in hand with the fighting forces of Canada and of the rest of the Empire are the scientists of the National Research Council of Ottawa. Already they have made numerous highly important contributions to the war effort, both in the industrial field and in the armed forces. In this photo one of the research workers is shown as he subjects steel helmets to special tests. One has been penetrated by a bullet and the other has resisted it. The scientist is trying to find out why.

CHAPTER V

It hadn't yet occurred to Sally that the dull pattern of her life changed. This did not seem like an adventure. It was merely trouble. Her car was stolen, and her luggage along with it.

However, she was aware that it was nice having a handsome young man offering her assistance, even if he was merely a truck driver.

After he had helped her up into the truck cab, he climbed up beside her. Behind the seat, on a burk-like platform, was something covered with a blanket and a newspaper.

"That's Donovan, my assistant," he said. "He's half ostrich, and always covers his head with a newspaper when he sleeps."

Sally laughed. "Does he really sleep there?"

"Sure. But if he snores too loud, we'll wake him."

The driver started the big truck, maneuvered it out onto the highway. To Sally, it looked like hard work, but he seemed to do it easily, as if he were very strong. She looked at his hands on the wheel—noticed that they didn't look like a laborer's hands.

When the truck was rolling along the road, he turned and gave her a glance.

"Don't worry," he said. "The police will find your car."

"My bags were in it, and all the clothes I own were in my bags."

"That's tough luck. It may spoil your vacation."

Sally didn't reply to that. She realized that, if she had to buy new clothes, her two hundred dollars wouldn't go far. If it disappeared too quickly, she might have to go back to Midvale—and Charlie Porter was waiting back in Midvale.

"The name's Michael Shane," her companion said. "Mike to everybody."

"Mike's Sarah Martin," she replied. "Sally to everybody."

He flashed her another glance, and grinned. "Hello, Sally."

It wasn't far to the state-police station. The truck came to a noisy stop in front of it.

Mike Shane helped Sally down, then paused a moment, looking up at the truck.

"Funny that Donovan's sleeping so quietly. He usually snores like a four-alarm fire, hey, Donovan?"

When Donovan didn't answer, Mike shrugged and turned away.

He and Sally went into the station and told the trooper at the desk about the stolen car. Sally gave the officer her owner's card, and he wrote down some information.

"You didn't see anybody hanging around the service station?" he asked.

"No," said Sally. "Might've been a hitch-hiker. But we'll get him! The information will go over the teletype, and police all over this part of the country will be looking for the car."

"You really think it will be recovered?" Sally asked.

"Sure. The truck will be abandoned after he's used up all the gas. They always do."

Sally told the officer she could be reached at the Broadview Hotel in Seabrook, then left with Michael Shane.

Outside, Michael said, "A truck's not the best transportation, but it looks like you'll have to ride on to Seabrook with me."

"You wouldn't mind?"

"You're the one who should mind," he said grinning. "I'll be glad of your company. Donovan will sleep the whole way, and he's no company even when awake."

So Sally rode with him, and the big truck roared through the night, Michael talked. He asked questions and, when he learned that she was a librarian, he talked about books. He surprised her. He was well read, and discussed what he had read intelligently. Sally hadn't imagined a truck driver would have a fondness for books.

He guessed her thoughts. "Surprised, eh?"

"Yes," she admitted.

"Oh, I'm no ordinary truck driver."

Sally had begun to think he was a Great Britain, presented by Reaney Peletier.

In Memoriam

DR. A. J. MURCHISON

It was with the deepest sorrow that his friends learned yesterday of the death of Dr. A. J. Murchison of Clyde River, one of P. E. I.'s foremost physicians, which occurred at his home following a brief illness.

Dr. Murchison was a man of outstanding ability in his profession, loved and respected by young and old, and his death in his 77th year leaves a sad blank in many homes. He was born at North River, June 9, 1864, son of the late Captain Malcolm Murchison and received his early education in Prince of Wales College, later going on to Trinity College, Toronto, where he graduated in 1888. The following year Dr. Murchison took up post graduate work in London, Edinburgh and Glasgow, receiving the degree L. R. C. P. S., Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Dr. Murchison leaves to mourn besides his widow, the former Miss Jessie McQueen of Glenarry, Ont.; Dr. J. R. Murchison of Humber River, Dr. H. A. Murchison, Supt. of Fitchwood Hospital, William and Daisy at home, and one daughter, Mrs. Wm. W. Brown, Pleasant Street, Charlottetown. A son Malcolm and daughter Isabel, wife of Mr. Edwin Johnston, predeceased him by a few years.

The funeral services will take place from the Presbyterian Church, Clyde River on Friday. Service starting at 2:30 p. m.

Obstruction Removal Aids Salmon Runs

Salmon spawned in greater numbers in Nelson Creek, British Columbia, last year and all because a big boulder that used to be there wasn't there any more. The Dominion Department of Fisheries had it removed, at small expense, and as a result the spawning grounds were enlarged by about half a mile, increased numbers of fish were able to get up the creek to spawn and congestion which formerly existed on spawning beds in the lower reaches of the stream was ended. "The removal of this boulder," says the Department's resident inspector for the district, "has improved the spawning area in this stream 200 per cent. A good number of fish moved well upstream, and approximately one-half mile of new spawning area is now being used."

Spring Starts With Moisture A Mixed Quota

TORONTO, March 25.—(CP)—The western grain-grower has one eye on the weather these days and the other on the government's program aimed at reduction of wheat acreage. The government's proposals may cause much discussion, but precipitation records and similar matters become less controversial as preparations for spring planting get under way.

Fall and winter precipitation across most of the southern prairies has been well above normal and over the prospects for this year's grain crops. Likewise throughout Western Canada conditions have not been so favorable, but farmers hope spring rains will create a brighter picture.

Western Manitoba, with an increase of 23 per cent above the average, provided the high part of the statistical record prepared by the Dominion Meteorological Office covering the six-months period from Aug. 1 1940 to Feb. 28, 1941. The excess in southern Alberta amounted to 20 per cent and slight increases were recorded by northern and southeastern Saskatchewan.

Deficiencies in other parts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan were not very marked but good rains are badly needed in central and northern Alberta where decreases from the normal of 25 per cent and 23 per cent respectively were registered.

BY PROVINCES

General improvement over the corresponding period in 1939 and 1940 is indicated in the record for the individual provinces. Manitoba shows an average increase over normal of eight per cent compared with a decrease of 19 per cent and Saskatchewan a decrease of four per cent as against a deficiency of 38 per cent a year ago. Alberta's position is not quite so good, a 10 per cent decrease from the normal comparing with eight per cent last year.

Southern Alberta is most favorably placed among the various sections of the grain belt. There the excess was brought about largely through heavy rains in September and October. Under ordinary circumstances October precipitation stands the best chance of being frozen into the top-soil and thus retained throughout the winter. August rainfall was mainly responsible for western Manitoba's big increase.

MONTHLY REVIEW

August rainfall was below normal in Alberta, Saskatchewan and eastern Manitoba. In western Manitoba, nearly twice the normal amount of rain was reported. In northern Alberta, northern Saskatchewan and eastern Manitoba, September rainfall was 40 to 50 per cent below the average. On the other side the account, southern Alberta showed an excess of more than 100 per cent.

Welcome October rains were general throughout the West. Twice the normal amount of precipitation was registered in southern Alberta and southeastern Saskatchewan and the gain was well marked in the northern section of Saskatchewan. November precipitation was well above normal all over Saskatchewan and Alberta and normal in Manitoba.

During the winter months of December, January and February snowfall was normal or better in Manitoba and Saskatchewan except in the drought area of Saskatchewan where there was 40 per cent deficit. Alberta divisions also reported figures below the average.
