SELWOOD of SLEEPY CAT

by FRANK H. SPEARMAN

COPYRIGHT by CHARLES SCRIBNERS SONS. W.N.U. SERVICE

Moses, confident at first, found himself hazy when it came to identifying the precise scene of his disaster. With his guide he walked clear to the camping-grounds without success, and McAlpin, on the way back to the station, was growing very impatient when Moses, of a sudden, stopped his companion and pointed to a man just going into a large and quite pretentious frame saloon.

"That's the fellow," he exclaimed eagerly.

"What fellow?"
"Just going in there—he dealt the cards. And that's the place!" whispered Moses with excitement.

McAlpin looked at the place pointed out and turned a hard stare on his companion. "Man alive!" he cried, "what kind of a fool are you to pick out the worst place 'tween St. Joe and Sacramento to leave your money in? Come along to the barn!"

"Ain't you going to talk to 'im, as you said you would?" asked Moses timidly, but dreading to face his mother again.

"Talk in there?" echoed McAlpin scornfully. "Do I want to get knifed? Not yet. Come along. You're lucky you didn't get knocked on the head and thrown into the river. That's Bunty Bartoe's place.

McAlpin returned to the barn out of humor. He wasted little time, when got back to the office, in explaining things but, leaving Moses to take the brunt of the storm, became very busy with some mules just being brought into the barn by teamsters putting them up for the night. It was nearly supper time, too, and McAlpin, to avoid further discussion in the office, dodged out the back way for something to eat. A hearty meal restored pretty well his naturally placid outlook on life, but when he got back to the barn this was upset again by the spectacle of Mrs. McCracken sitting alone in the twilight of the rough office, silent and woe-begone. Another long talk resulted in an opening of his heart again, and ended in his telling her to go get her supper and come back. He would see, meantime, whether something more might be done.

"If only my poor brother William—William Pardaloe—was here, Mr. McAlpin—he'd make these thieves hunt their holes," sobbed Mrs. McCracken.

McAlpin pressed for help and still indignant at Mrs. McCracken's new story, was not minded to let escape. He darted between the big fellow and the door. "No—stop, John, look here a minute. I want you to hear this!"

Lefever saw there was no escape, and he was forced to hear the whole story. "Well," he asked, at the conclusion, "what are you going to do about it?"

"What can I do? It's Bunty Bartoe's place, John. Can I afford to get dumped into the river?"

Lefever, as if disclaiming personal responsibility, moved out into the barn. But McAlpin hung on to him. Then Lefever said something, whatever it was, in a low tone that caused McAlpin to lower his tone. A whispered conference followed. "Do you think it would be all right to ask him, John?" urged McAlpin, as Lefever turned to get away.

"If he doesn't want to do it, he won't do it, will he?" snapped Lefever.

"Would he get angry with me asking him, d'y' think?" called McAlpin after his retreating friend.

"If he does I'll get your job, won't I? No! He won't get angry."

Lefever was half way down to the stalls. McAlpin stopped long enough at the office door to tell the "Mrs." and Moses to bid—speaking sternly to Moses. Then grabbing his cap he hustled into the street.

Head down, and only glancing, without lifting it, from under the short visor of his cap at the men in twos and threes and scattered groups—teamsters, emigrants, frontiersmen, adventurers—that lolloped in the open spaces or moved aimlessly along the middle of the street, McAlpin made straight up to the hill above the River quarter toward a large frame structure set some fifty feet back from the street below the brow of the hill isolated. A broad sign, high above the large double doors of the building—thrown wide open now

Cracken. "I'd not have to ask nobody for help if I had William."

"Well, if William, whoever he is, was here, Mrs. McCracken," retorted McAlpin tartly, "he could have the job for all of me!"

Mrs. McCracken could eat no supper, but she spent thirty minutes back in camp weeping, and then rose to a resolution of her own. With Moses as a guide she resolved to seek the men that had robbed Moses—and did so.

Naturally, she got scant recognition, and was hardly given time to introduce herself and tell her story, before Moses was thrown bodily into the street and Mrs. McCracken was strongly urged, under threat of arrest, out after him. Neither storms nor tears availed; the two arguments that had always subdued her dead husband had no weight in the River quarter.

Baffled and disheartened, she returned with her son to pester McAlpin and, having cornered him, told of the fresh indignities she had suffered in her efforts to reclaim her own.

To her surprise, the barn boss was angry at her. He told her flatly she had disobeyed his orders, ruined everything; and on this the two joined issue.

It was in the very midst of their animated discussion that a well-set, leisurely man walked unobtrusively into the office. This was John Lefever, head wagon boss for Russell and Wentworth, just in with a long string of wagons, west-bound. With feet of small size and notwithstanding the largeness of his frame, Lefever walked gingerly and with hardly any noise. He carried in his hand a long whip; this he placed in the rack quietly in order that he might lose nothing of the talk going on behind him; and to emphasize his ostensible indifference to the subject-matter he whistled softly to himself as he fingered the other whips in the rack and, having selected one to try out, turned slowly around, the prey to curiosity, to see what manner of person was matching Jim McAlpin for once in fast talking. Having satisfied himself on this point by a brief glance, Lefever started for the door leading into the stable.

McAlpin pressed for help and still indignant at Mrs. McCracken's new story, was not minded to let escape. He darted between the big fellow and the door. "No—stop, John, look here a minute. I want you to hear this!"

reading "John Selwood, Gambler," left no doubt as to the nature of the owner's business.

David Tracy—the old "partner," afterward so seriously wounded—whom Selwood had originally set up in the establishment, had been given carte blanche—and used it—in spending money to make his gambling hall a western place to be talked about.

With Tracy disabled, young Selwood had assumed entire responsibility for the place. And as a further defiance to any aggrieved enemies of the Sanger-Boyl following, Selwood's name, at Tracy's behest, though against Selwood's wishes, had been conspicuously placed above the doors. Selwood's was known from the Missouri river almost to the Sierras as an exceptional place and one of repute—where there was no saloon and no disreputable adjunct, and none play, and where no limit was placed near it; where no one was asked to on the players.
