"CATCH-MY-PAL"

"There are five men at the lamp-post you ought to get to sign the pledge," said a workman to Rev. J. R. Patterson. He went back with the speaker to the group. They talked the matter over. Signed the pledge within a week. "Next week I want you to bring in a man each to sign the pledge," said Mr. Patterson to the group. Next week there were eleven, six new men and five of the first lot. One man was away looking after a sick relative. Next week there were thirty-one men, hoopers, toppers, soakers of the worst type. Next week one hundred and five. Within five weeks six hundred men had signed. Within one year 140,000 men had signed the pledge in Ireland. "Catch-My-Pal Movement."

THE EVOLUTION OF THE ULSTERMEN

Twice the Dutch saved the liberties of the western world. The first time they defeated Spain in their heroic struggle for independence. The second time they produced that great statesman, William III, who spent his whole life resisting the tyranny of France. Twice, too, the men of Ulster helped to save the liberties of the western world. On the first occasion the defeated James II. and through him the far-reaching ambitions of Louis XIV. The second occasion was when they fought in the American War of Independence and took part in defeating the efforts of George III.

For fifty years the question of paramount importance to Louis XIV. was that of the succession to Spain. James II. never understood that all his plans for his restoration to his kingdom must be based before this dominant thought in the mind of his powerful patron, Ireland or England was to be in the front or in the back ground of French policy according as each helped or hindered the solution of the intricate Spanish problem. Just as Pitt considered Canada as Germany, just as Napoleon aimed to conquer Pondicherry on the banks of the Vistula, so Louis tried to conquer Spain in Ireland. Apparently the combat lay between William and James, but really the principals were William and Louis. James played but a minor part in this struggle, though he thought, and in fact was led by Louis to believe, that he was a principal actor in the drama, they being unfolded on the stage of history. As such he wanted to attack his successor directly in England and thus bring matters at once to a head. It was Louis, however, who really directed the strategy of this campaign, and his aim was to weaken, not to destroy his enemy. He wanted England to be so occupied with its internal troubles that it would have no time to spare for what happened in or across the Channel. In days gone by, Richelieu had employed such methods in Scotland, and they had prolonged the civil war. What Richelieu had done in Scotland, Louis could do in Ireland. The French King felt more drawn to the latter country than to the former. So far back as 1666, he had received an offer from some Irish Roman Catholics of the submission of their country if they were aided in their attempt to throw off the yoke of England. Now Tyrconnel made a similar offer; and this, harmonising with French plans, determined Louis to send James to Ireland. If James went to England, he might succeed at once or he might fail. The expedition of Monmouth ended swiftly in disaster. If James went to Ireland, France, which in 1689 still had control of the sea, could easily hinder English reinforcements. Louis would best be served by a long-continued and desultory warfare, rendering William incapable of action in Europe and making the Channel a cipher in naval affairs. The 1641 rebellion had lasted ten years, and there was no reason why that of 1689 should not last a similar period, especially when the French generals were urged to pursue a Fabian policy of mastery inactivity. If not decisive ensued, sooner or later William must feel it to be his duty to go to Ireland and, unless James Louis must see to it that his occupation was provided for a term of years.

When William saw that events had reached a crisis, and that his presence was imperatively demanded, he resolved to set out for Carrickfergus in order to bring matters to a clear and final issue. We can conceive the exultation with which the news of his departure was received at Versailles. The astuteness of the French monarch seemed about to meet with the success it deserved, for William was destined in the mind of Louis to remain away eight or ten years; and this absence from Europe left the way open to Holland by way of Belgium, practically destroyed the alliance with Leopold, and ensured the triumph of Louis's plans in Spain.

With the raising of the siege of Derry, James saw the fall of his prospects. It was no longer possible for him to go to Scotland or even to promise to send men to Dundee, and it was just as impossible to prolong the contest in England. Another of Louis's aims was accomplished. The struggle was to be confined to Ireland. But the determined stand of Ulster made possible the landing of William, though in the dark days of uncertainty it had looked as if all the designs of Louis would be successful. To this day the descendants of the heroic take the deepest pride in the noble achievement of their ancestors. The walls of the city are patriotically preserved. The anniversary of the day in which the gates were closed, and the anniversary of the day on which the city was raised, are annually celebrated from 1689 to the present time. Last July a fine window, in memory of the relief of Derry, was placed in St. Columba's Cathedral. The picture on its extreme right represents the thanksgiving procession to this cathedral on August 12, 1689, when the Bishop of Derry (the famous Earl of Bristol) and his clergy, the Roman Catholic Bishop, Dr. M'Derrett, and his clergy, the Presbyterian ministers and elders, the Mayor and Corporation, and others, united in a common act of thanksgiving to God.

All Ulstermen feel a deep pride in the defence of the walls of the maiden city, but they feel an even deeper pride in the battle of the Boyne. In the north the farmer invariably possesses a picture of this battle, while in the south he possesses a picture of Robert Emmet in the dock; the two pictures are representative of the two nations. They bear witness to what John Stevens recently observed in 1890 as "The Unconscionable hatred between Ulster and Munster. The Ulsterman knows that the military triumph of William at the Boyne was slight, but he also knows that the fight of James to France converted it into a victory of the first magnitude. For in declining the fate of the lesser it decided that of the greater, and finally that of Europe. Louis XIV. then, has left a lasting impression upon the character of the Ulster farmer, but he has left an even more lasting impression upon it. It is not too much to say that on the character of the Ulster artist (To be continued.)

SPLENDID SETTLERS

Gaelic Speaking Scottish Americans Locating in Canadian West. Among the recent arrivals into Western Canada, was a most unique party composed of 35 Scotchmen, a portion of the Mackenzie clan, who migrated from Oklahoma. They all bear the name of Mackenzie, and are descendants of those members of their clan who came to the American continent with Lord Baltimore 200 years ago. At that time they settled in the state of Maryland, and remained there and prospered as farmers for 175 years. Twenty-five years ago a portion of them attracted by the territory which had been opened up in Western Oklahoma went into that state. Norman Mackenzie, the leader of the party, states that they left Oklahoma owing to the failure of their crops for the past five years. They are fine looking men, all being typical Highlanders, tall and safe. The peculiar thing about them is that they speak Gaelic perfectly but with a strong American accent which makes it difficult for their fellow countrymen, who come into contact with them, to understand.
