Winter Quarters For Pulletts

Early hatched pulletts are already beginning to lay, and before many eggs are laid the flock should be placed in winter quarters. If housing is delayed longer after the pullets are well developed, and laying has been in progress, sometimes the change in management may injure production. The house should be thoroughly cleaned and repaired before the pullets are housed. At the Dominion Experimental Station, Fredericton, N. B., all old stock is removed from the house about two weeks before the arrival of the pullets. The old flock can be culled and sold at this time and quarters can usually be found for the remainder of the birds. All nests, roosts and other movable equipment are taken out to facilitate cleaning with the shovel, scraper and broom. The house and equipment are then scrubbed thoroughly with a hot lye solution, using about one teaspoonful of lye to a gallon of water. They are then sprayed with a coal tar disinfectant, used at about double the strength recommended by the manufacturer for ordinary disinfecting. A suitable ventilation system is important during the fall and winter months, as pullets will not usually give satisfactory results in a cold draughty house. At the Dominion Experimental Station, Fredericton, N. B., a glass and cotton front house with a straw lott was remodelled by insulating the walls and ceiling with shavings and by replacing the cotton fronts with sliding glass frames. This house is in an exposed position. It has never given satisfactory results but after it was remodelled, production was over 60 per cent for the entire winter.

LOST FROM LIFEBOAT Gordon Scott of Montreal (above) former provincial treasurer of Quebec, lost his life during rescue operations after the liner Western Prince was torpedoed. This was disclosed Dec. 18 when Hon. C. D. Howe, Canadian minister of munitions and supply, and two executive assistants disembarked and told a harrowing tale of their experiences. Scott, financial adviser to the minister, and at least six others in a lifeboat containing 26 survivors, were lost when it struck the side of a rescue ship and capsized. Scott fell between the rescue and the boat. His body was not recovered. He was born in 1868.

AIR FORCE SAYS OKAY - THE BOOTS STAY ON

It's seven months since John "Tex" Rees came up from the deep south to join the R.C.A.F., and he's worn those cowboys boots every day since. "It'd kill me to lug around those heavy air force things," he drawled, and he convinced the M.O. His only concession to form is to tuck the boot tops inside his pant legs when on parade at Dunnville school. Rees likes Canada and the air force so well, he's written all his pals to come for, too. The school was officially opened Friday.

Prompt Aid For Depleted Woodcock

Prompted by the present depletion in woodcock in North America, the governments of Canada and the United States have reduced the open season for woodcock by fifty per cent, as a means of providing special temporary protection for this popular gamebird. Hunting of woodcock in Canada is restricted this year to a period of three weeks, while hunters in the United States may pursue woodcock for only fifteen days. These protective measures were effected through the cooperation of the Department of Mines and Resources in Canada and the Department of Interior in the United States, which have the responsibility of administering in their respective countries the bird conservation laws based on the Migratory Birds Treaty. Millions of Canadian birds wintering in the Gulf States were destroyed during the exceptionally severe and prolonged freeze-up last winter. Among them were great numbers of woodcock, the mystery game bird that affords much enjoyed sport for many hunters in Canada. In Louisiana, where the majority of North American woodcock winter, the feeding grounds of these birds were frozen hard for more than a week at a time. One observer in that state counted hundreds of dying woodcock in an hour and a half. Careful counts and observations by trained investigators in Canada and the United States during the past spring and summer have revealed that the population of woodcock on their breeding grounds was undoubtedly lowered by the heavy winter losses sustained by this bird, although some breeding grounds appeared to have been affected more than others. On two large tracts where the number of woodcock nests in the previous year were known, comparison showed a decrease of about forty per cent in 1940. The action taken for the protection of the woodcock and the sport it affords is an instance of modern game management on a continental scale, with careful fact-finding followed by prompt and well-balanced preventive measures. With the cooperation of hunters in reducing the drain on the woodcock population this fall, it is hoped that an open season of the length formerly enjoyed may be restored in full next year.

Not Even the C.O. Gets By Defence Lines at Camp Borden

So keen are the men of the Irish regiment on the 400-yrd defence system of trenches, dugouts and weapon pits they've set up at Camp Borden, that not even the battalion's second in command could get through their lines unchallenged. Making an unheeded visit of inspection one night, Major Alan Cockeram found himself a prisoner of war. Shown in these photos are some of D company's troops, who spent three days in conditions as close as possible to actual trench warfare. They like the life in the dugouts (LEFT) and having to melt snow over a fire when they want a shave, like the man at CENTRE. And work parties pitch in with a will to the music of the piper (RIGHT). They say it sounds even better at night - and it keeps the wolves away.
