RICHARD'S CONFESSION

The following day Richard went for a long walk through the park. His admission to Anne that he was in love with the dancer was a revelation to himself. He had not meant to say those words, even in his innermost heart. After all, he was married, and he had for his wife a deep affection and unbounded respect. He was torn now between his duty to Yvonne and this new force which threatened to sweep him from his moorings.

He resolved not to see Mademoiselle again. But even as he took the resolution, he was turning his steps toward her apartment. He would tell her he loved her. He owed her that. Then he would rejoice his wife.

Yvonne knew matters were approaching a crisis in her relations with Richard. She had known of his love for her days ago. Only a few days more and she could tell him the truth. But first he must admit his love for her. She greeted him that afternoon with a smile and a hand-clasp that thrilled him. He sat close by her side. Neither spoke for a moment, then Richard took her hand.

"Mademoiselle," he said, "I have a confession to make."
"Yes, my friend," Yvonne answered softly.

"Nearly four years ago I came back to New York hoping to find old friends and places unchanged. I had cherished in my heart the memory of a young and lovely girl, whom I hoped to love and make my wife if she was still free. I found instead a blasé society woman who frightened me with her boldness.

"I ran away. I went to Paris and from there to Normandy, where I met and married a young peasant girl. She was all that was good and beautiful and pure and for three years she made me a perfect wife. She was much like you in appearance. Whether she loved me or not I do not know. But while I fell for her a deep affection and respect, I did not love her. I do not love her now and I shall never love her as a man loves a woman.

"I LOVE YOU"

"For a long time my work satisfied me. My wife kept my comforts so that I gave no thought whatever to them. I lived for my work. Gradually though, I tired of this way of living. I had made my wife promise that she would not change. At the end of three years of marriage, she was still a simple peasant girl—pretty, an excellent cook, totally unfitted for any kind of social life. My nerves began to trouble me. My doctor told me I needed change. I went away for three months, leaving my wife alone. She did not seem to mind my absence and on my return things went on as usual for a time. Then I began to grow restless. Again my doctor ordered me to find other interests besides my work, but I felt that in fairness to my wife I should not lead a life she could not share.

"It was after I had come to this decision that she one day asked permission to visit her old grandparents in France. I consented and she has been away now for nearly four months. During that time I have taken up all my old interests—and some new ones."

He paused and held her hand closer. "And now I find that I love you—love you as I did not dream a man could love a woman. I tell you because I must tell you. And having told you I must give up. My wife's faith does not permit divorce. There is nothing honorable I can offer you, even if that could be overcome; if she would be willing to give me my freedom, I cannot wound her by asking it. She has been a true and faithful wife to me and I owe her protection."

He caught her hand to his cheek and held it there. She stroked his hair with a hand that trembled. He buried his head in her lap.

"Pity me, pity me," he cried, "I love you madly—and there is an unbreakable barrier between us."
Yvonne bent over him, her secret trembling on her lips. But no, this was not the way she wished him to know the truth. For weeks she had cherished a plan. A day's delay would let her carry it out. So she kept silent, only murmuring his name at intervals.

Presently he raised his head and took her hands.

"Do you love me?" he asked.
"I love you she said sweetly. "But too much, far too much to let you do anything dishonorable. I love you more, because you regard this poor young wife of yours as you do. Richard, will you let me think overnight of what we are to do? Perhaps my woman's wit, my woman's heart, can perceive a way out for us all."

"TOMORROW, AT NOON"
"You are an angel," Richard said

ferently. "I will wait however long it must be if you can find a way for us. But there is no such way, in honor, I am sure."

Yvonne pressed his hand gently. "Do not be too sure," she said, "Come back tomorrow, at noon. We will lunch and afterwards we will talk."
Richard rose and looked at her seriously. When he spoke his voice was thick with longing. "I want to crush you in my arms, to love you madly—and all I can do is to plan to run away from you. I will lunch with you tomorrow—and after that I will sail to rejoin my wife. But your image will go with me to death."

Yvonne laughed a little. "How dramatic, my Richard? There—I am not laughing at you. I am near to tears. Come tomorrow. Perhaps there is a way."

As he turned to go, he removed to take her in his arms. But Yvonne stopped him.

"Let us not spoil it, my friend," she said.

He checked himself and rushed away, taking with him that last picture of joy. He own husband, her very own husband, had fallen in love with her new self. And yet he was strong enough to wish to be faithful to her old self too. Was there ever so delicious a situation?

She danced into her bedroom and stopped to unlock a small cedar chest which stood there. From it she took the silk peasant costume which she had made for herself so many moons ago. Quickly she stripped herself of her modish clothes. Another few moments and she was standing as Richard had last seen his wife in stamford, a rather pathetic figure in her full skirt, touching the ground, and her right bodice.

She had stepped back into another existence. Tiptoeing to the mirror she whispered: "Tomorrow he shall know—he shall have Yvonne and Mademoiselle, the old wife and the new love—all in one."

Poincare Speaks For 17 Hours

(Special to the Guardian)
PARIS, June 27.—Premier Poincare today told the joint Finance and Foreign Affairs committees of the Chamber of Deputies that the Ruhr occupation, besides bringing 300,000,000 francs net profit to the French treasury, also was responsible for coercing Germany into accepting the Dawes reparations plan. He will review the new Young reparation plan tomorrow and Friday and it is now expected the committee, after hearing Foreign Minister Briand next Tuesday, can complete its report within 48 hours. The date on ratification of the war debts agreements has now been tentatively fixed for July 5. Today was the fifth day that the Premier addressed the joint committee, completing a total of 17 hours of talking.
