RIVALRY OF THE TRAIL
By Samuel White

By night he sat surrounded by his browng officers, his pale, squinting eyes ever on the alert for a lurking shadow.

Once Claude had considered stealing up on Chavignaud's sleeping bag at night, but the sight of the sentries discouraged him. Too much depended on complete success—vengeance for his father's death, security for his mother and Chavignaud face to face and he would wait for that time, even if he was forced to delay till the end of the long trail at Kamistiquia.

CHAPTER VI
Like a painted landscape the route wound before Claude's eyes, a landscape so vast that he might not glimpse it in the distance. It was a landscape vivified by the yellow Rabiscaw canoes, the crimson shirts of the French voyageurs, blazing colorfully across its endless panels.

But at last they shot by the Riviere Creuse up the Deschamps, Roche Capitaine and Deux Rivières rapids and reached the mouth of the Mattawan, where the route turned from the main artery and followed the banks of the Mattawan. The camp of Northwesterers and XY men were close together, as usual, that night. As usual, there was the nightly brawl and in the morning as old Andrew Valmorin oversaw the launching of the canoes, he came to McGillivray with a grim face.

"You remember Chambly, the officer of the Simcoe canoe?" he demanded without parley.

McGillivray nodded briefly. The Simcoe canoe traveled immediately in the wake of his own craft. It carried one of the most important cargoes in the whole fleet and when it debouched from the French river it would leave the rest of the fleet and skirt the Georgian bay shore to the mouth of the Severn. The camp was situated the head post of the Lake Simcoe district.

"Well, Chambly's disappeared," Andrew informed bluntly.

McGillivray stood up. Throughout the weeks of the trip that had already elapsed he had been depressed, suspicious of the other men's peccadilloes. He had anticipated a mass battle between the fleets long before this. Was Chambly's disappearance the beginning?

Through the trees that bordered the water's edge McGillivray saw the fleet of XY canoes embarking. This was the first time in the voyage that Chavignaud had taken the lead for any day's paddling.

He strode to the water's edge and hailed.

"Chavignaud! I think Chambly went to your camp last night. Where is he now?"

A taunting laugh came from the XY leader's canoe. "Chambly's gone home to his wife and children."

"How should I know? Perhaps he's in our camp yet. Why not look and see?"

McGillivray and Valmorin strode hastily across the evacuated camp ground of the XY men and looked it all over, even down to the slabs of rocks at the water's edge. There, half in and half out of the water, they stumbled on Chambly, with his head crushed in by a stone or a club.

Standing above him, old Andrew made the sign of the cross. "And may he rest in peace," he muttered grimly.

McGillivray said nothing at all, but his face grew black as a north-west wind as he turned and slowly disappeared up the river, leaving the Simcoe canoe to drift down the river.

"They've marked the Simcoe canoe," he told old Andrew. "Chambly was a light man and they got rid of him at the first opportunity, to make their work easy."

"Yes, brooded over the news. "And now they're gone ahead for the first time, to trap the canoe at the French's mouth. It doesn't take an Ingonquois to read that sign. Who'd I pick to fill Chambly's place?"

"No one," yet," counseled McGillivray. "Watch your canoe-men from here to the mouth of the French, and there pick the man to take the Simcoe canoe through the XY's gauntlet."

Through the stormy Nipissing and the awesome French river, then the brigade camped at the river's delicate mouth. The XY fleet was outside, some sitting on the shore, on the innumerable islands that dotted the shore of Georgian bay.

Claude Galliniec left the site of the camp to watch the line of pickets, down to the shore, where slow waves, their crests flecked with crystal from the starlight, rolled gushing across the beach. He sat on a boulder where the forest fringed the sand, staring out across the black water, reflecting on the fate that had led him so close to the man he was trailing, yet always kept him from a final encounter.

As he sat there came faintly to him the sound of a paddle's splash, over to his right, where the river diverged with the bay. Instantly he was on his feet, striding across the beach in the shadow of the trees toward the sound. A raiding party from Chavignaud's camp? It had long been expected. A passing Indian?

He stopped by the channel of the river, peering alertly out across the darkened water, searching for the line of pickets, and he could see the outlines of a canoe drifting slowly down the stream.

"Who's there?" he called sharply. His answer was a soft, feminine laugh. "A spy!" came Margaret Ross's lilting voice. "Who are you my cautious guard?"

As Claude walked slowly to the water's edge Margaret turned the canoe in toward the bank.

"Oh, Claude!" Her sudden pleasure at recognizing him filled the youth's heart with a quick, lulling rhythm.

He helped her beach the canoe, handed her out onto the shore.

Generals Set
New Standard
With C. A. S. F.

By EDWIN JOHNSON
SOMEWHERE IN ENGLAND, Sept. 6.—(CP)—The general's directing field operations and activities of Canada's expanding overseas force are setting a new standard in democratic military leadership.

When action starts they will be right in the thick of it with their officers and men where they can give the most direct and personal attention to the job in hand.

Gen. G. E. Peakes, commander of the 1st Division and Maj.-Gen. V. W. Odium, commander of the 2nd Division, are all of the same ilk. They have been through the mill of rugged soldiering and not one of them would ask his men to undertake a task he would not as readily tackle himself.

The Generals are usually up and about long before reveille summons their men to duty. They seldom call it a day until the early hours of the next morning.

Every day for months, Gen. McNaughton has devoted much of his time to experimentation with weapons and ingenious schemes to defeat any attempted invasion.

Goes Everywhere
He has ridden in tanks of every type, through well-constructed traps and formidable barriers to get a first-hand impression of what the enemy would have to contend with. He has propped himself in the gunner's seat of anti-aircraft gun carriers to test out Canadian-designed mountings, and accompanied the results on exercises to ascertain the merits of new tactics or the effectiveness of new weapons.

Many of the lives and welfare of thousands of men are at stake it is essential to test these things personally before releasing them for general use," he once remarked.

Similar experiments are also being carried out by Gen. Odium in bringing the 2nd Division to the highest state of efficiency.

During the first week after his arrival in England, Gen. Odium motored thousands of miles, studying the terrain, inspecting airfields, mapping roads, lines of communication and directing special demonstrations or experiments which would add to the striking power of his formations.

TRY PICKLE CANAPE FOR TASTE THRILL
Here is a different taste canape suggestion: Remove the centres of large sour or dill pickles with a fruit corer and stuff the pickles with cream cheese, lightly seasoned with chopped onions, minced parsley and dillseeds. Chill for an hour or longer. Then, with a sharp knife, cut off 1-8 inch crescent slices.
