

It May Be Urgent

When your Children Cry for It

Castoria is a comfort when Baby is fretful. No sooner taken than the little one is at ease. If restless, a few drops soon bring contentment. No harm done, for Castoria is a baby remedy, meant for babies. Perfectly safe to give the youngest infant; you have the doctors' word for that! It is a vegetable product and you could use it every day. But it's an emergency that Castoria means most. Some night when constipation must be relieved—or colic pains—or other suffering. Never be without it; some mothers keep an extra bottle unopened, to make sure there will always be Castoria in the house. It is effective for older children, too; read the book that comes with it.

Blue Murder

BY EDMUND SHELL

Dick Hays was waiting for him in the drawing-room. "How are you, Ian?" he cried as the other came in. "It's good to set eyes on you after all this long time. What's this nonsense you were burling about cables and Greta?"

He had a habit of shouting everything he said, as if he spent most of his existence in a home for the deaf. He was tall and almost incredibly thin, with broad, somewhat stooping shoulders, long, artistic-looking fingers and a lean, bearded face. Taverner had not seen him for upward of three years—and yet he could have sworn that he was wearing the same suit of brown tweeds, with its saggy knees and pockets that bulged as if he were accustomed to stuff them with his paraphernalia.

"How are you, Dick?" He motioned the other to sit down. "I don't quite know what to say about Greta," he continued. "She's gone to Italy right enough. I saw her off myself yesterday morning. I'll let you have a look at that cable presently. It was perfectly clear though, I stated that you were seriously ill and wanted to see her at once."

Haye stroked his beard and glared into the fire. "Extraordinary!" he muttered; "most extraordinary!—Who was it that addressed you?"

"To me—and signed Dick." "The other bend forward." "You're sure that there isn't a boy in the office?—Although she does happen to be my daughter, Greta's a decidedly pretty girl. They might have planned an elopement. You know what young people are."

Taverner shook his head slowly from side to side. "It won't wash, Dick," he answered. "Greta's not that kind of girl. I've given her a free hand here, and she's always acted squarely with me. For all I know, she may have admirers, but I'm prepared to bet you anything she wouldn't stoop to an elaborate plot of this kind to get married. Why should she?"

Haye spread out his hands and dropped them on to his knees. "It is very remarkable!" "I should never be surprised," pursued the other, "if Greta walked into my study one fine morning with the announcement that she proposed retreating married on the following day. She might be precipitate, but she'd be frank about it, nevertheless. No, Dick, I hate to pose as an alarmist, but there's more in this unfounded business than meets the eye."

He touched the bell. "You think so, eh?" "I'm sure of it. You can bring in the whisky, Jarrett—and tell Mullins to see that Mr. Haye's bed is aired." "He sprang up suddenly and began pacing the room. "You've more than an inkling, Dick what my job is. A career of his sort brings one enemies. You would hardly expect it to be otherwise. These enemies are divided to two classes—those who know me and those who would like to know. In a general sort of way, these enemies of mine and myself sit opposite me now that this actually ever coming into contact with one another. We are the generals, so to speak, and our respective agents serve as cannonfodder. Warfare is waged along certain fixed lines and according to certain accepted rules. Occasionally, however, a foe comes into the field who treats these conventions with contempt. And it is a person in his category who, I believe, has spirited Greta away."

"The painter sat back in his chair, with his legs crossed and the tips of his long fingers pressed together in front of him.

"And do you mean to tell me my daughter has been kidnapped by—"
"By a fellow styling himself the Lizard," said Taverner bluntly. There was a brief period of silence while Jarrett brought in the tray and sat it down.

"Greta" pursued the Baronet, "is due in Rome at 8 o'clock tomorrow morning. I'll wire my fellow there to look out for her. I'll let my men in Rapallo know, too. They're immediately interested in the Lizard and may be in a position to follow him up."

He rang the bell again. Jarrett appeared in the doorway. "You rang, sir?" "Yes; ask Mr. Baird to come in." "Very good, sir."

A few moments later the door opened, admitting a tall, bronzed, gray-haired man, with a pronounced military bearing. "I want you to get out two cables in code, Baird. If you don't mind. One is to go to Lamotte at Rome and the other to Marney:—Miss Haye due Rome Thursday morning 8 o'clock. Lizard attempting to kidnap. Do all in your power." He glanced at his brother-in-law for approval. "I fancy that should answer our purpose."

Haye nodded. "I have no suggestions to make." Taverner looked at Baird. "We'll get these off as soon as possible. If anything occurs to me before the morning we'll have time to wire again."

"I understand perfectly," said the other—and the door closed softly. Haye had helped himself to the whisky. "That's not the chap yet had when I saw you last," he remarked. "No. I—er—I was rather unfortunate with my last secretary. He met with a sudden end, poor chap! Sir Ian did not say what his end had been; he did not want to harrow the other's nerves. Haye was rather like a volcano in imminent state of eruption."

"Greta's my daughter, you know set him off and there was no stopping him until the fires of his delamatory vengeance had burnt themselves out."

"What makes you think it was this—this Lizard, Ian?" Taverner had returned to his chair. "I have my reasons."

His noncommittal answer evidently annoyed Haye, for he moved restlessly, and two patches of crimson appeared on his cheeks. "Hang it all, Ian," he burst out; "Greta's my daughter, you know, even though I have showed the responsibility of her upbringing on to your shoulders. I think you might be me explicit."

Taverner moistened his lips. The crater was sending out smoke already! "You've got to be patient, Dick," he said. "We're treading on pretty dangerous ground. There are lots of secrets that I am prevented from touching upon, even in the privacy of my family circle. I try to make it a habit not to jump to conclusions. When I said that the Lizard had abducted Greta, it was not an effort to be dramatic or even wise. My deduction was based on very solid earth—on a series of events which have happened during recent weeks. The Lizard is the only opponent who has ever carried the war into my own territory—into this very bog, in fact, I am as sure as you are sitting opposite me now that this has occurred after its receipt is the work of a man who cherishes some peculiar grievance against myself."

He took a mouthful of spirit and replaced the glass on the table. "This fellow was particularly well informed. He knows of the private staircase by which my agents come to visit me from time to time; he had a key to the door which leads from it to my study; apparently he was thoroughly conversant with the movements of my household. It hardly requires a stretch of imagination to assume that he was aware that I had a niece of whom I was very fond. If he desired to hurt me, he could have devised no better way than to kidnap her."

Haye picked a cigar from the box, tested against his ear, and lit it without troubling to remove the band. "Who is this Lizard, Ian?" "That is precisely what I am trying to find out."

The cigar had tilted to a truculent angle. Haye only lacked the cap to make him the living image of a famous fictional skipper. "But your agents—"

"Could tell you no more about him than I can myself. He is a mystery. We have no very clear idea as to his motives or his ideals, if he has any."

"A pretty dangerous fellow." "Very!" "Good Lord!"

Haye shifted his back from one corner of his chair to the other and the furrows on his forehead deepened. "But hang it all, Ian," he burst out, "this is horrible, horrible! My daughter—lured from your house by a false wire—fallen into the hands of a ruthless, international desperado of whose identity you are unaware. * * * Great heavens, man! what are we going to do? What can we hope to do?"

Taverner blinked. "We're not certain yet that she has been taken. One of my men may be able to put in an appearance before it is too late." He drew his chair closer to the blaze. "I have a particularly good fellow in Rapallo at this moment a chap who was my adjutant in the war, and in whom I have the greatest confidence. He has tackled the Lizard on two occasions at least, tackled him with his bare fists in face of a new and singularly effective weapon. If we hear no news of Greta in the morning, I'll take him off the job he's on now and instruct him to concentrate on the Lizard."

The volcano smote the table with his fist. "If we hear no news of Greta in the morning," he shouted, "or if we hear bad news of her, I'll fly to Italy myself, even if it costs me every penny I possess to do so!"

HOW MANY FEATHERS ON THE TURKEY?

$50.00 to the Person who counts them correctly—Other awards from $20.00 down

Dick. You would be absolutely powerless."
"Damn it all, Ian! I could try!"
The other glanced from his brother-in-law to the fire and from the fire to the heavy curtain over the window. Presently he got up and left the room abruptly.

It was ten minutes before he returned.
"What about those pictures, Dick?" he said.

"Those? Oh, they can go hang! I saw the fellow this afternoon and
