Helicopter May Fan Away Farmers' Insect Worries

Hovering over a herd of cattle, a helicopter equipped with "Kelley's Koolie Killer", provides a quick and effective insecticide dusting.

By NEA Service

YAKIMA, Wash., July 9.—(NEA)—An item catalogued as "Kelley's Koolie Killer" is threatening to shove the helicopter right into the front row of the farm implement picture alongside the tractor and the plow. The "Koolie Killer" is an aircraft crop and cattle dusting machine adapted to helicopters by Frank H. Kelley, Jr., farm specialist for Bell Aircraft. Coupled with the windmill-type aircraft, the killer has been buzzing over the countryside in these parts to stifle the buzzing of flies and mosquitoes which were threatening herds of cattle. The helicopter made three or four runs over the cattle to accustom them to the flying windmill, and then hovered just over the herd, releasing DDT. Down-draft of the rotor shot the insecticide to the ground and then whirled it up and around the cattle. The same plane was used to dry a cherry orchard which had become rain soaked. If allowed to dry naturally in the sun, the cherries would have split and been ruined for marketing. The helicopter, acting as a giant fan, blew the water from the cherries. "We won't know until the end of the summer just how successful the helicopter is as a farm machine," says Herman A. Poulin of the Central Aircraft Corp. here. Bu (Poulin) an authority on aerial farm dusting adds "we do know that the helicopter is far more efficient than a regular airplane because it actually is dusting and spraying 50 out of every 60 seconds and can be reloaded right on the farm."

MAY SAVE BILLIONS

Poulin says a standard airplane dusting fields or cattle is over its working area only seven seconds out of every working minute. The rest of the time because the plane must make wide turns and travel much faster is used up in making approach runs. "We believe," says Poulin, "that we have a machine here that will save the farm a large percentage of the six billion dollar loss he suffers every year from bugs, weeds and rodents. "We'll know for sure by October."

Together with the tractor and plow, the helicopter and its insect spray may become an effective farm tool.
