Broken Wings

CONTINUED
FAREWELL TO THE ISLAND

To go forward and be discovered by the native woman or to go back and hide?
Katherine and Bill asked each other this question silently in the long moment that followed the first sight of the canoe. Did this promise hope of rescue or did it mean possible imprisonment? It is probable that if it had not been for that, so changed things for them both, Bill would have decided for hiding. But now he realized desperately that things were changed, and he resolved to catch at any straw of hope for getting away from the island.
Katherine may have read his thoughts, may have fathomed the working of his mind. With a half defiant gesture she caught his arm and motioned him back toward the forest. He shook himself free.
"Please—you and I, alone here, Bill."
"No!"
The die was cast. The sound of his voice reached the ears of the busy women. With one accord they faced the white man and woman standing like brown images in their surprise and fear. There followed a wild scramble for the canoes, and into the midst of the flight Bill strode, caught two of the women by the wrist and held them firmly but gentle at his side. Their companions paused, looked at the white man, shrugged their shoulders in a fatalistic manner and waited for what was to happen next.

Bill released his prisoners and beckoned the women to follow him.
Katherine watched from a little distance. He led them to the wrecked Falcon and flapped his arm in imitation of wings, pointing how and then to the sky to give them the idea of flight. He showed them the wrecked plane, which they refused to touch. He shaded his eyes with his hand peered out over the sea pointed shook his head, put his hand over his heart and pre-tended to cry.
Katherine drew nearer. She was interested now, she hoped Bill could make them understand his pantomime, even though she did not entirely comprehend its purpose. She wanted anything Bill did to succeed.
She saw the native women stare curiously at her, then look back at the white man.

"Kino, kino," said one of the brown women pityingly. Katherine was to learn later that this was their way of saying "It is bad, too bad." Bill continued his pantomime pointing to himself and Katherine, holding out two fingers, then gestur-ing toward the island and shaking his head to indicate there were only two of them, alone. Next he pointed to the canoes, to Katherine to himself. But by this they understood that he wanted one of the canoes and there were violent headshakings accompanied by exclamations of "La, la," which Katherine supposed was their word for "No."

"Explain some way that you do not want to take a canoe away from them," Katherine said, "you don't, do you?"
"Not at all. I want them to take us along."
"Why?"
"Wherever there is a group of natives sooner or later a ship will come to trade with them. It may mean our chance of escape."
"Are you so anxious then to leave our island?" Katherine asked sadly.
During this soliloquy between the white man and woman the natives watched silently, alert for any attempt to take one of their canoes.
They saw the woman turn aside from the man, saw him regard her with perplexity and speak to her again.
"I am only anxious for your safety," he told her.
"I am safe here with you," she responded.

The man set his lips: "I want to get us away, Katherine, where we can be married, where you can have some comforts."
Katherine shrugged her shoulders:
"As you will, then," she said.
"Think, too, of your father and mother. We may be able to get some word to them. I am sure it is best for us to leave with these natives if I can persuade them to take us."
For a moment the old willful Katherine showed herself "I don't want to go," she said, tossing her head.
"Katherine, please because I love you, Trust me."
She faced him then her eyes alight.
"I do trust you, Bill. I was being selfish and thinking only of my own happiness. It is with you, wherever you are, you know."
The patient brown women saw the man take the girl's hand in his.
They watched curiously while he took the hand of one of the native women and led them both to one of the canoes. He seated himself and the two women in the canoe and made signs that he wished them all to go together toward their island over the water.
A great clattering broke out then:

The native women consulted among themselves, and finally one of them came close to Bill and Katherine and said: "Tuan, chief, Aruman—him live—" and she waved her hand out toward the ocean.
Bill shouted, "She knows some English—yes, chief! Take us to your chief where him live."
The woman nodded and lapsed into native speech again, nor could they get her to speak another English word. After a great deal of talk this woman once more approached Bill. She smiled at him, then laid her hand on Katherine's forehead as though to indicate friendship.
"You will take us chief?" Bill asked again.
Apparently she comprehended him for she nodded her head and the others joined her in this sign of approval. One by one they approached Katherine and placed their hands on her forehead. Bill did not touch, in fact, they seemed to avoid even looking at him.

Broken Wings

"I'll go and collect our things," Bill told Katherine. "Don't be afraid. They won't harm you now. I am sure. Strange that there are no men with them, isn't it?"
Katherine smiled at him. "I'm not afraid. This one that said the English words is rather sweet, isn't she? Don't forget Peanuts, I'd like to take him along for a souvenir." Bill departed to the huts to get their belongings together. There was very little to get, the flying suit, the sheepskin coat, Katherine's vanity case, the notched stick; he left the dairy written on leaves as being too bulky; the thermos bottle, his knife; and as an afterthought some bits of wood from the Falcon's splintered propeller. Peanuts he could not find. The monkey, frightened perhaps by the sight of so many people, had fled and was nowhere to be seen.
"He'll be all right," Bill assured Katherine. "He'll go back to his tree and live with his old companions. He's probably got a girl friend there, anyway. Some day we'll come back to visit our island, and find him and all his grand-children on the Reception Committee."

The native women had meanwhile been inspecting the camp. From their expressions and their tone of voice Bill concluded they did not think much of the construction of the huts. "Probably think we're hardly civilized," he said to Katherine with a grin. They spent an hour poking about, and Katherine and Bill grew weary and impatient with waiting. It was not until the tide turned that all the women gathered around the canoes. With various gestures they made Bill and Katherine understand that they must stay out while the canoes were launched. But when Bill attempted to help them there was evident disapproval, and finally he left them to accomplish this task alone.
When the canoes were floating they showed Katherine and Bill that they were to occupy the middle places of the smaller one. Shellfish and the remains of the supply of coconuts Bill and Katherine had collected were loaded in. The larger canoe led the way paddled rapidly by the natives, whose bare brown arms flashed in the afternoon sun.

More slowly the second canoe got under way. Out over the water Bill headed away from land. The white man and woman looked back as long as they would. Just as the sun came down toward the water they raised their hands in a gesture of farewell. "Broken Wings Island" had disappeared from view.
