The DOOM TRAIL

by ARTHUR D. HOWDEN SMITH AUTHOR OF PORTO BELLO GOLD ETC. COPYRIGHT BY BENTANOS

"The Ho-nun-ne-gwen-ne-yuh," he replied. The Indians are a superstitious people, and they have come to believe that there is some supernatural agency behind the Keepers of the Trail. In plain English, they fear the Trail is haunted, they tell us, by the False Faces, a race of demons from the underworld, to whom Murray has sold his soul, and that the demons have rallied to his aid."

"At every turn we run against the shrewdness and wit of this fellow Murray," exploded the governor. "Tis at once a tribute to his ability, and perhaps an index to our inferiority, that we have never been able to secure certain information of his operations."

"Tis evident, your excellency," I ventured, "that the lords of trade will accept only positive evidence that he hath evaded the law." "That means legal proof of smuggling," reflected the governor. "And now that the lords of trade have suspended our law, his operations are no longer illegal, strictly speaking," said Coiden. "But I make no doubt he will continue to handle the bulk of his goods over the Doom Trail, for he will not care to have his dupes in the province realize the enormous tribute they pay France through him."

Governor Burnet brought his fist down upon the table with a thud. "Gadsdill!" he swore. "There is naught for it but war! We must be after the dog! We must run him down! But we must move un-officially. What say you, Coiden?" "We can do nothing with official support," rejoined the surveyor general, "and 'tis probable we shall receive the instructions of the lords of trade to suspend the law by the next Bristol packet."

"There can be no question of that," agreed the governor. "Well, the law shall be suspended. I will have the suspension publicly proclaimed. Then under cover we must concert the measures to be taken. That will be for Master Ormerod. Do you still crave the opportunity, knowing the full measure of its perils, sir?" "I am more anxious, if possible, sir," I answered. "I speak French sufficiently well to pass on the frontier for a Frenchman. As for danger—why, your excellency, the man who has ruined his life can have no fear for it. He has all to gain and nothing to lose."

"True," assented the governor. "But you know nothing of woodcraft or the life amongst the savages." "Master Juggins gave me a letter to one Peter Corlier, a— Coiden said suddenly erect. "Peter came this morning with the Seneca chief, if your excellency will remember."

"So he did. We will have him in." Coiden went out, and returned at once with two companions. One I recognized, to my amazement, as the Indian I had befriended an hour or two earlier. He greeted me with a faint smile. To the governor he rendered the splendid arm-high salute, and his deep voice boomed out: "Qua, Ga-en-gwa-ra-go!" ("Hail Great Swift Arrow"—the Indians)

"The Seneca drew himself erect. 'Ta-wan-ne-ars is your friend, C-en-gwa-ra-go. He is not the friend of Onontio the French governor general of Canada, regardless of identity, who rules at Quebec. Most of the white people are not well-wishers to the Indian. I am come here with Corlier to prove my friendship. On the frontier 'tis said Joncaire, the Frenchman who governs the trading post by the falls of Jagara (Niagara) is about to begin the building of a stone fort."

"A fort!" protested the governor. "Sure, 'tis impossible! 'Twould be a direct violation of the Peace of Utrecht."

"'Tis true," spoke up Corlier.

"The other man was more like a tavern keeper than a woodsman. At first glance he seemed all paunch, but when you studied him closely you saw that his fat was firm and hard and formed a sheathing for the most powerful set of muscles any man ever had. His face was tremendous, with little insignificant features; but his eyes, behind the rolls of fat which almost masked them, twinkled with constant interest and animation, belying the air of stolid stupidity he affected. "This is Corlier, Master Ormerod," said the governor. "And with him is come a friend of ours, one of the two war-chiefs of the Six Nations. Peter, Master Ormerod hath a letter for you from Master Juggins in London."

"Ja," he said vacantly. I handed him the letter. He turned it over and over in his hand and picked at the seal. Then he handed it to the Indian. "You read it," he said. I looked from one to the other with astonishment; but 'twas the governor who intervened. "Your pardon, Peter," he said good-naturedly enough, "but that letter happens to deal with a most confidential subject."

"Oh, ja," said Corlier indifferently. "But I do not read." "Take the letter, Ga-en-gwa-ra-go," said the Indian. "Ta-wan-ne-ars does not seek your secrets. But you need have no fears. This young Englishman is 'Ta-wan-ne-ars' friend."

And in his sonorous English, with a slight guttural intonation, he recounted how I had rescued him from his childish persecutors. The incident recalled my promise, and I broke in impetuously upon his closing words. "Aye, your excellency, but he hath forgotten to add that I pledged myself to beseech you to make it illegal to mock at Indians in the city streets."

"An excellent thought," approved Coiden. "We have trouble enough winning the friendship of the tribes without subjecting the visiting chiefs to humiliation in our midst." "It shall be done at once," declared the governor. "He drew forward a fresh sheet of paper and hurriedly scrawled upon it the necessary instructions, then returned his attention to the Indian. "Ta-wan-ne-ars," he continued, "I need your friendship. I need the

His voice was high and squeaky, and sounded ridiculous coming from such a giant. "Hath the building begun?" demanded the governor. "I think not. Ta-wan-ne-ars brought me der word at Onontaga. We comend to you as fast as we could."

"Ta-wan-ne-ars came because it was partly the fault of his people that the French are settled by Jagara," said the Indian. "Yes," replied the governor. "Onontio and Joncaire first made the Onelidas drunk, and then bargained with them to sell the Senecas' land."
