HANDICAPS ARE ALLRIGHT in RACES!

BUT handicaps in business are a different matter, one intelligent merchant remarks to a competitor as they meet, watching the youngsters get ready for a handicap race. "What's the point in trying to hobble a business with extra taxes just because its more efficient methods enable it to save customers' money?"

If all merchants assumed this sort of attitude, there would be no talk of special taxes on chain stores. The trouble is that some retailers seek higher profits for themselves at the expense of the buying public. They know that if they can increase the cost of doing business for the chain stores by special taxes and thus force up retail prices in chain stores, they will be able to increase their own retail prices proportionately—with correspondingly higher profits for themselves!

But whose interests should come first? Your interests or the interests of a relatively few inefficient people among thousands of retailers? You can answer this question in your own favor by voting against the unfair, un-British handicapping of chain stores simply because they are efficient.
