SWEET VANITY by RICHARD GOYNE

By chance, they met one lunch hour in Midley's high street. Her attention had been diverted by a shop window, and thus Peter was standing before her, speaking, before she could evade him. She permitted him to walk with her a little way, and as they talked one old topic was raised.

"Haven't you seen yet, Peter," she mocked, "that you can't force a woman to your way of thinking? Really, you have a lot to learn!"

"I never give up, Cynthia," he replied, smiling faintly. "By the way, I shall be seeing you to-night if you're at home."

"Oh!" "Your father wishes to see me," he answered.

With that she had to be content. But when Mr. Harland returned for dinner that evening, looking as if he had aged ten years in the past seven days, and when Cynthia tackled him about the invitation to Peter, a lump rose in her throat at his quiet answer.

"I asked him to come, my dear," he replied, gazing up the long table eadly, and shaking his head. "I have come to a breaking point when my only course is to call in Peter Cavendish, and see if we can do a deal."

"But, Daddy, I don't understand. Do you mean that we need Peter to help us? That—?"

"I'm afraid so, my child. Thirty, forty years ago I built up a prosperous business; but times move swiftly. To-day I am old-fashioned, and people go to Peter Cavendish because Peter is young and brilliantly modern. Harland's is dying, an almost-dead concern: Cavendish's is soaring, though I feel convinced Peter does not know the gravity of my position. My only chance is amalgamation. If I can get that, and Peter as my partner rather than my rival, then I am saved. But, and again he smiled, sadly, "I'm afraid, very much afraid, I am asking much and offering him little more than an old-established name."

Dazed, Cynthia looked across at her father. "It means we are—ruined, unless Peter helps?"

"Yes." Impulsively, defiantly, she came towards him and wound her arms tightly about his neck, pressing her pale cheek to his own.

"Daddy—oh Daddy, I never dreamed, never dreamed it was so bad! But it can't be failure. It shall be ruin, Daddy! Listen, we'll sell the Larches and take a smaller house. We'll spend less money. I'll give up everything I can. We—"

"My arms drew her to him. "My dear, we should have done that before. It is too late."

"Was ever more gentle, generous, or cutting reproof. A sob escaped her lips. She knew, now, how costly had been her wildness and her extravagance. She had been thought less only, but now it seemed to her that she had done the most grievous thing; she had hurt and broken the one who, in all the world, had done most for her.

"It will rest with Peter, my dear," he added, slowly. "We must hope for the best. I tried to get another loan from the bank to-day and failed. They—"

A bell rang somewhere beyond that room. Jameson came in. "Mr. Cavendish, sir," he said, quietly.

What an agony of self-reproach and self-condemnation and anxiety the next hour was! Cynthia crossed to the drawing-room and tried to play, but her fingers were paralysed upon the keys. The music was, nevertheless, the one soothing thing. She felt, as she heard now again the muffled voices beyond the walls, that if she stopped playing it would only be to permit those tears of bitterness, humiliation and despair welling in her eyes. And Cynthia—with Harland pride—had considered tears a weakness never to be excused.

She went on playing. What hope was there! How she had offended and disdained the man upon whom their whole future depended, now! Yet would she, could she accept his help?

She was terribly sorry, for her father. If only she could do something, of only she could work— She laughed, bitterly. What value had the accomplishments of hands trained only to play? What a fool she had been; an unpardonable, inexcusable fool!

In all her moments of regret and sorrow she had never hated herself, despised herself as she did in this moment.

There were excuses—a weak and indulgent father, no mother ever to use that influence that might have saved her at the beginning, and the Harlands had ever been so proud that...

But Cynthia, to do her justice, had no thought for these things that might have excused her. Her fingers were wandering mechanically upon the keys now damp with her touch. She did not realize that...

Islander's Death In Iowa, U. S. A.

The Ireton, Iowa, Ledger of March 2nd, contains notice of the death of Mr. Daniel R. Stewart, a native of P. E. Island. The deceased learned his trade of carriage building at New Annan in the carriage shop of the late James Tuplin and left here May 1st, 1879, and proceeded to Iowa. He has many friends in this Province who will learn with regret of his passing, including Judge W. S. Stewart, now Mayor of Charlottetown, and Mrs. Percy Marchbanks, of New Annan, who were cousins.

Three brothers survive on the island and a sister at Marshfield, and another sister in New Hampshire.

The Ledger in the course of a lengthy reference to his death says: Daniel R. Stewart, one of the best known citizens in this community, died at his Ireton home last Sunday following an illness for several months. His death removes from Ireton one of its oldest citizens and his passing will be mourned by a host of friends who will sorely miss his jovial and kindly salutations on Main street and his friendly counsel and helpfulness that had been so readily sought throughout the many long years of his enthusiastic interest of the welfare of the old home town.

Dan, as he was familiarly known with his young wife and infant daughter, came to town at a time when, you might say, there was no town here. He at once acquired possession of property and constructed a building in which he engaged continuously until stricken with the illness that caused his death. Possessed of a kindly and considerate disposition he readily made friends and with enthusiasm he joined forces with the early Ireton pioneers in the development of the home town and in which he never tired throughout the years.

He seldom left town for long and witnessed the passing or removal of practically every citizen since the town started but his enthusiasm never waned in carrying on the fight for the best interest of Ireton. He was one of those who took the initiative in the early days to travel overland many miles to procure the saplings with which to beautify the Ireton landscape and many of these trees stand today as monuments to the ardent achievement of the pioneers. He always took his part in every worth while project for the betterment of the town.

Daniel Reed Stewart was born at Marshfield, P. E. Island, Canada, on January 28th, 1857, and died at his home in Ireton on February 26, 1933, at the age of 76 years and 30 days. He was the third child in a family of thirteen born to Donald and Priscilla Stewart. In 1879 at the age of 22 Mr. Stewart left the parental home to seek his fortune in the states and went directly to Chicago. He was a carriage maker by trade and sought employment in that metropolis but found only the charred remains of the great Chicago fire. Undaunted he left Chicago for Clinton, Iowa, and later to Des Moines. Here he became convinced that there was need for blacksmithing in the vast farming country and went to Atlantic where he had employment for some time. He concluded he would embark in the business for himself, and located in Audubon, on December 7, 1880, he was united in marriage to Alice M. Everett at Atlantic and immediately took his bride to the home he had prepared for her at Audubon. Here their only child Alberta Stewart Noon, was born. Disposing of his business at Audubon the family moved to Ireton where Mr. Stewart purchased a blacksmith shop. Had he lived until the 7th of March he would have been in business here 48 years in the same location. At the time he built his present home the public school was the only other building on the east side of Main street. All the rest was farmland that he saw divided into town lots and beautiful new homes made.

Besides the widow and one daughter their loss is mourned by nine grand-children and one great grandchild, also three brothers and two sisters, all of whom have the profound sympathy of the community in their bereavement.

Mr. Smythe (entertaining a few friends): "You didn't brush the cobwebs off this bottle, William!"

William: "Excuse me, sir, but I saw you putting them on, so I thought I'd better not touch 'em."

IN MEMORIAM

JAMES SOLOMON MUTCH

We are reminded as the seasons roll around of the truth of the statement that, "Time like an ever rolling stream bears all its sons away." Memory however fondly recalls and cherishes the friendships and joys of former days. The kindly touch of the vanished hand is not so soon forgotten by those who remain. "They do not die nor lose their mutual sympathy." We cannot it is true call them back but we have the comforting thought that, "Those we call the dead are breathers of an ampler day."

Such is the consolation that comes to one as memory revives the passing of James Solomon Mutch on March the 23rd, 1933 in his 69th year.

During the passing of those months his presence in the home, church and community has been greatly missed. His generosity, social and friendly characteristics will not soon fade from the memory of his many friends, but are revived at the anniversary of his departure.

During his many months of comparative retirement owing to heart trouble, he ever warmly welcomed those who visited his home. The same unchangeable qualities of kindness and sociability were his to the close of life. Sometime previous to his departure he seemed to improve in health. On Sunday, March the 20th he in company with his brother, George attended service in the morning at Clifton Church and again at 3 p. m. was present at the Mt. Herbert service.

When returning a visit was made at the home of his sister-in-law, Mrs. Percy Mutch, while there he was suddenly smitten and passed away on the above mentioned date. He answered his summons as he heard "The signal of his release in the bells of the Holy City, the chimes of Eternal Peace."

The funeral services were conducted on March the 25th by Rev. Mr. Murray of Powna assisted by Revs. Dr. Ramsay and H. Pierce the latter a former pastor giving the address.

His many relatives and friends were present to pay their respects to one whose memory they revere and cherish. All that was mortal of our friend was laid to rest in the family plot at Mt. Herbert.

"The memory of the just is blessed."

He leaves to mourn their loss three brothers, George, Ernest and David in the community near by and two sisters, Margaret, Mrs. James McMillan of Vancouver, B. C. and Mary Ellen, Mrs. Robert Coffin of Calgary, Alta.

CHARLES H. BIGGAE

There passed peacefully away at his home at Stanley Bridge on March 15th, 1933, Charles H. Biggae. The deceased had been in failing health for the last year, and despite all his loved ones could do he passed away on the above date.

The late Mr. Biggae was a kind husband and father, a man of quiet habits, always devoted to his home and family, always ready to help any one in times of sickness or trouble.

He leaves to mourn his widow, Emily E. Williams of Grahams Road, one daughter, Bertie now Mrs. Davis E. Baker of Summerside, who tenderly cared for him in his last illness, one adopted daughter, now Mrs. Lorne E. Houston of North Rustico and two sons, William W. of New York City, and F. Stanley at home also one sister, Mrs. Christy Williams of Ellerslie.

The funeral was held on March 17th, conducted by Rev. Mr. Paley assisted by Mr. Osborne. The hymns sung were "The Lord is my Shepherd", "Nearer my God to Thee", "Sleep on Beloved Sleep". "The old rugged cross" was beautifully rendered by Mr. Roy Phillips, undertaker. The pall bearers were: Bruce McKinnon, John M. Quinn, George M. McKay, Lorne E. Houston, John A. Andrews, Roy McLeod. His remains were laid to rest in New London cemetery to await the last call.

Wool-Gather This Spring

NEW YORK, Mar. 23—Wool-gather to your hearts' content this spring, ladies. At home or abroad you will want to wrap yourself in wool. You will be content to sit in it from daylight until dark and maybe even later, for some of the woollens are so sheer and beautiful in texture that they are worthy of lavish afterdark entertainment. A visit to any large store, wholesale or retail, where woollens are on display brings genuine enjoyment. The eyes may feast on colors and weaves; the hand luxuriates in softness and sheerness of texture. To see and to touch is to be convinced of the importance of woollens in the spring and summer mode.

The American manufacturer has put his best efforts into the creation of very wearable fabrics unusually fine in quality. For the sober type of suit that has elegance there is a fine twill. You remember your mother's best suit was generally of twill? Well, here is a better edition. If it's were an era of "Sunday suits" you would consider twill for yours, too; that is, if you like monotonous, for it comes in the dark blue that is a perennial spring favorite, and in black, gray and grege.

But since this is a sporting era when you don one suit for luncheon and tea, or town and country the manufacturers have also turned out fine rich tweeds that are perfect for the English sport type of suit, and these fabrics, with their homespun weaves, with their checks and their chevrons, run a pretty close second to their English and Scotch cousins, the Lincolns and Harrisles, Glenurquharts and Cumberlands. For classic tailors makes they have turned their attention to the mannish type of suitings with a firm surface, the kind that makes one feel well-groomed in every line.

Visitor: "But aren't you too small to stay up so late?"

Joan: "Mummy says so, but in the morning she tells me I'm big to be in bed."

Dr. Wood's Cold Settled In Chest Caused Racking Cough
