THE SEA HAWK

by RAFAEL SABATINI

CHAPTER I THE HUCKSTER

Sir Oliver Treasillian sat at his ease in the lofty dining-room of the handsome house of Penarrow, which he owed to the enterprise of his father of lamented and lamentable memory and to the skill and invention of an Italian engineer named Bagnolo, who had come to England half a century ago as one of the assistants of the famous Torricelli.

This house deserves, together with the story of its construction, a word in passing. The Italian Bagnolo had the mischance to kill a man in a brawl in a Southwark tavern. As a result he fled the town, nor passed in his headlong flight from the consequences of that murderous deed until he had all but reached the very ends of England.

The fugitive, Ralph afforded shelter and Bagnolo, repaid the service by offering to rebuild the decaying half-timbered house of Penarrow. Having taken the task in hand he went about it with all the enthusiasm of your true artist, and achieved for his protector a residence that was a marvel of grace in that crude age and outlandish district.

The main doorway was set in a projecting wing and overhung by a massive balcony, the whole surmounted by a pillared pediment of extraordinary grace, now partly clad in a green mantle of ivy. Above the burnt red tiles of the roof soared massive twisted chimneys in lofty majesty.

But the glory of Penarrow was the garden fashioned out of the old tangled wilderness about the old house that had crowned the heights above Penarrow point. Time and Nature had smoothed the lawns to a velvet surface, had thickened the handsome boxwood hedge, and thrust up those black yew-like pillars that counted the Italianate appearance of that Coromendes.

Sir Oliver took his ease in his dining-room considering all this as it was displayed before him in the mellowing September sunshine, and found it all very good to see, and life very good to live. Now no man has ever been known so to find life without some immediate cause, other than that of his environment, for his optimism, Sir Oliver had several causes. The first of these, though it was one which he may have been far from suspecting—was, his equipment of youth, wealth, and good digestion; the second was that he had achieved honor and renown both upon the Spanish Main and in the late harrying of the Invincible Armada and that he had received in that the twenty-fifth year of his life the honor of knighthood from the Virgin Queen; the third and last contributor to his pleasant mood was Dan Cupid who had so contrived matters that Sir Oliver's wooing of Miss Rosamund Godolphin ran an entirely smooth and happy course.

So, then, Sir Oliver sat at his ease in his tall, carved chair, his doublet untrussed, his long legs stretched before him, a pensive smile about the firm lips that as yet were darkened by no more than a small black line of mustache. It was noon, and our gentleman had just dined, as the platters, the broken meats and the half-empty dagon on the board beside him testified. He pulled thoughtfully at a long pipe—he had acquired this newly imported habit of tobacco-drinking—and dreamed of his mistress, and was properly and gallantly grateful that fortune had used him so handsomely as to enable him to toss a tile and some measure of renown into his Rosamund's lap.

By nature Sir Oliver was a shrewd fellow and he was also a man of some not inconsiderable learning. Yet neither his natural wit nor his acquired erudition appear to have taught him that of all the gods that rule the destinies of mankind there is none more ironic and malicious than that same Dan Cupid. The ancients knew that innocent-looking boy for a cruel, implacable, and they mistrusted him. Sir Oliver either did not know or did not heed that most piece of ancient wisdom. It was to be borne in upon him by grim experience, and even as his light pensive eyes smiled upon the sunshine that footed the terrace beyond the long mullioned window, a shadow fell athwart it, which he little dreamed to be symbolic of the shadow that was even falling across the sunshine of his life.

After that shadow came the sub-wooing—tall and gay of raiment under a broad black Spanish hat decked with blood-red plumes. The smile perished on Sir Oliver's lips. His swarthy face grew thoughtful, his black brows contracted until no more than a single deep furrow stood between them. Then slowly the smile came forth again, but no longer that erstwhile gentle pensive smile. It was transformed into a smile of resolve and determination, a smile that tightened his lips even as his brows relaxed.

Came Nicholas his servant to announce Master Peter Godolphin, and close upon the lady's heels came Master Godolphin himself, leaning upon his beribboned cane and carrying his broad Spanish hat. He was a tall, slender gentleman, with a shaven, handsome countenance, stamped with an air of haughtiness; like Sir Oliver, he had a high, bridged, intrepid nose, and in age he was the younger by some two or three years. He wore his auburn hair rather longer than was the mode just then, but in his apparel there was no pomposity than is tolerable in a gentleman of his years.

Sir Oliver rose and bowed from his great height in welcome. But a wave of tobacco-smoke took his graceful visitor in the throat and set him coughing and grimacing.

"I see," he choked, "that ye have acquired that filthy habit."

"I have known filthier," said Sir Oliver composedly.

"I nothing doubt it," rejoined Master Godolphin, thus early giving indications of his humor and the object of his visit.

Sir Oliver checked an answer that must have helped his visitor to his ends, which was no part of the knight's intent.

"Therefore," he said ironically, "I hope you will be patient with my shorthand Nick, a chair for Master Godolphin and another cup. I bid you welcome to Penarrow."

A sneer flickered over the younger man's face.

"You pay me a compliment, sir, which I fear 'tis not mine to return you."

"Time enough when I come to seek it," said Sir Oliver with easy, if assumed, good humor.

"When you come to seek it?" Sir Oliver explained.

"It is on that very matter I am come to talk with you."

"Will you sit?" Sir Oliver invited him and spread a hand toward the chair which Nicholas had set.

TOWN IN A QUANDARY

(By Dominion News Service.)

COLOGNE, Aug. 21.—The municipality of a small German manufacturing town has been placed in a most unpleasant quandary by the irresponsible action of the manager of the local municipal bank.

It appears that he speculated with the bank's funds during the mark fluctuation period, with the resultant loss of nearly three-quarters of a million sterling.

A prosecution is pending, but meanwhile the town is responsible to the depositors, and while a declaration of bankruptcy seems impossible, there appears equal difficulties in the way of levying a universal rate for the benefit of a few.

English Bishop Refutes Genesis

(By Dominion News Service.)

LONDON, August 21.—One of the most outspoken and vigorous of the modern churchmen, Canon Ernest William Barnes, Canon of Westminster, has been appointed to the Bishopric of Birmingham.

The new bishop, who is fifty years of age, was a bombshell among a large section of church people when he told the British Association in a sermon at Cardiff in 1920—and frequently afterwards reiterated the opinion—that the Garden of Eden was a myth.

The Genesis story of Creation, he maintains, is not accurate and cannot harmonize with modern scientific discovery.

Our Fish Ancestors

"Man," he has declared, "was not specially created by God. He is the end of a vast evolutionary process of Divine design by which during at least 100,000,000 years life has become more complex. To the biologist he is cousin to the apes, his ancestors, as embryology affirms, going back through amphibians to the fishes."

"We hold the full content of St. Paul's richest thought when we affirm that God did not at some moment in the past make man innocent in an earthly paradise, provided we also affirm that God is still making man, still shaping the consciousness which shall someday be the image of Himself."

Great controversy followed Dr. Barnes' declarations. By some clergy he was termed a materialist, and others hinted at heresy refusing to agree with his axiom that the Fall is not vital to Christian theology.

God's Design.

The outstanding point of the new bishop's theory is that man is struggling not to regain a lost perfection, but to be loyal to the design which God had in mind when first He created the world.

Canon Barnes has been similarly outspoken on many other matters. He has demanded a comprehensive reconstruction of theology and doctrine. "He has declared that people who come of unhealthy stock must realize that it is 'their duty not to have children.' He recently pleaded for the restoration of Germany."

Earth Tremors In a Coal Mine

(By Dominion News Service)

LONDON, August 21.—Earth tremors at Malby Main Pit, Rotham, gave rise to startling rumors in South Yorkshire lately to the effect that a big explosion had occurred.

The fact that it was the first anniversary of the great explosion at the pit, when 27 men were killed, added apprehension to the rumor.

There were four tremors which were felt over a wide area, and were accompanied by a crackling sound, resembling earthquake noises.

Several buildings, including the police station, were severely shaken. There were 420 men engaged on the afternoon shift in the Malby Pit. They made their way to the pit bottom without waiting to dress.

HOUSE WRECKED BY EXPLOSION

HAMILTON, Ont., Aug. 21.—A violent explosion, thought to have been caused by a bomb, completely wrecked a one-story frame cottage on Murray Street east late Sunday night. The house is owned by S. Agro and occupied by Sam Ollando.

It is the fourth occasion on which Italians' houses in this part of the city have been damaged by explosions during the past few years and Police state that Ollando was the recipient of a Black Hand warning letter a short time ago.

The entire central section of the city was shaken by the blast, the entire front of the house was torn apart and windows were shattered for many blocks about the building. The front door was blown out on to a lawn on the opposite side of

Equip Your Body for Success

MAKE it easy for yourself to win. Equip your body to successfully meet the many problems you must face each day. Have on tap always, boundless energy of body and mind.

The foods you eat, of course, are very important. You must choose them with care. You must see that they give your body the nourishment you pay for. Such a search will lead you to Grape-Nuts.

Grape-Nuts is concentrated nourishment. Whole wheat and malted barley give it a mighty store of the most vitalizing elements—phosphorus and iron, carbohydrates—all the essentials. A long baking process leaves these ready for rapid assimilation by the body. And then, because the whole wheat berry is used, Grape-Nuts contains an adequate supply of bran roughage.

Grape-Nuts is a perfectly-balanced food. Its crispness makes you chew it, thus aiding the teeth. It is easily digested; soundly nourishing; and economical, because there are many helpings in each package. Costs 1c per serving. Buy Grape-Nuts from your grocer and serve it tomorrow with milk or cream.

GRAPE-NUTS TOMATO SALAD

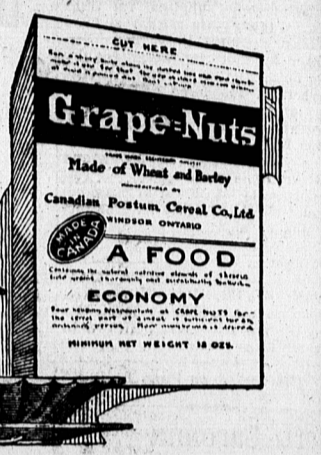

1/2 cup Grape-Nuts, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 envelope minute gelatine, 1 cup boiling water, 1 can condensed tomato soup, Mayonnaise dressing, small heart of cabbage, or lettuce.

Put the butter over the fire till melted, then stir in the Grape-Nuts. Remove from fire and add 1/4 cup on molder board.

Dissolve the gelatine in the boiling water, add the can of tomato soup. Mold in custard cups. When beginning to harden, gently stir into each cup a portion of the buttered whole Grape-Nuts, using the 1/2 cup in all. Set on the ice till hard, then turn out on a bed of lettuce or (preferably) finely chopped cabbage heart.

Sprinkle over the whole salad (tomato and cabbage bed) the Grape-Nuts dust already prepared, and serve with Russian dressing.

Russian Dressing.—Mix Mayonnaise dressing with one-half as much Chilli sauce, add one pinteno cut in small pieces. If preferred, plain Mayonnaise may be used.

the street and parts of the rear of the house were later found half a block away. Were followed the explosion and flames fought with fire for an hour to protect nearby homes.

The Ollando family was at a farm near Taplestown at the time of the explosion and the house was empty.

ROMANCE OF GLASGOW'S WATER SUPPLY

The early history of Glasgow's water supply, as with so many of the city's great public enterprises, contains the name of a pioneer who, from humble origin, became a veritable merchant prince of the great Scottish city.

The story of this man, William Harley by name, reads truly like a romance. A weaver by trade, from a humble little valley under the Ochil Hills, he went to Glasgow at the end of the eighteenth century, and quickly amassed a small fortune by the sale of a certain kind of check material which was fashionable at that time.

His success started him on a cycle of enterprises almost incredible to the modern reader. He rented a country house in what is now Sauchiehall Street—the Regent Street of Glasgow—and quickly turned the surrounding waste ground into highly-cultivated fields yielding rich crops. He made pleasure gardens and bowling greens where Blythswood Square now stands. The arch of a bridge on the road he built to reach these grounds was turned into an ice store. He inaugurated the city's first milk supply run on a standard of cleanliness then unheard of.

This side of his business activities grew apace, until his farms and dairies became known all over the country, and attracted thousands of visitors yearly, amongst them royal personages. From the fees for admission to this novel sight he made quite a handsome sum annually.

This was followed by a venture in the supply of bread to the city, which was equally successful.

Early Water Supply.

But the greatest enterprise was when he undertook to supply the citizens with water. At that time they drew their household water from about thirty wells, and had to carry it sometimes very long distances. Harley conceived the idea of delivering it at their doors, and instituted a service of daily water carts which supplied the populace at a halfpenny per pail. Soon he erected an elaborate and luxurious bathing establishment and recreation room in what is, to this day known as Bath Street, the only remainder today of this man's existence.

But others had visualized the problem of the city's water supply. For thirty years previously brains had been at work and many schemes had been brought up, but nothing done. Then, in 1806, the Glasgow Water Works was founded, followed by another similar concern two years later, pumping water from the Clyde to Dalmar-nock (where the great Corporation Power House is today).

By the 'fifties of last century, however, the idea that water supply was properly a municipal enterprise had gained ground, and in 1855 the city bought up the various companies then undertaking the work, and started to build the great water works at Loch Katrine. A most suitable place could hardly have been chosen, for the water is soft, pure and healthful, and the rainfall locally is abundant—over 100 in. per annum. Loch Katrine is one of the chain of lochs, fourteen miles long altogether, which form the Trossachs. By 1859 the works were finished, at a total cost of two-and-a-half millions (about $12,500,000), and the supply was turned on, amidst great pomp and ceremony, by Queen Victoria.

To take the water to Glasgow involved the boring of tunnels through the hills and the construction of gigantic aqueducts over the valleys and down the slopes, over a distance of thirty-five miles. In 1885 the single line of these was doubled, and today the twin aqueducts carry 80,000,000 gallons a day to the city. Crossing the roads which lead northwards from Glasgow into the Highlands, they are a familiar sight to tourists in those parts.

To Raise the Loch.

Although, later, Loch Arklet was added to the lochs forming the city's reservoir, the supply is apparently not enough, in spite of the consistency of British summers! So now they are preparing to raise the loch 5 feet in order to give two months' extra supply in case of an emergency.

The job is not so simple as might appear, although there is little enough flat land in all conscience around these lochs. A road, not open to motorists, runs round the north side past the Silver Strand and other romantic spots well known in the writings of Sir Walter Scott. There are farmhouses and piers lying not very much above the present level, and all these have to be considered. At bathing establishment and recrea-present there are four contracts in progress, the chief of these being that of the road, which is being reconstructed at a considerably higher level than its former course. Half is already finished, and the remainder together with the other contracts, such as the raising of the piers, the sluices, dam, and so forth, is expected to take fully two years more.

When it is finished it may be a great day for Glasgow's municipal history, but it will obliterate many landmarks for which the Scots have a romantic attachment. At the same time, the new road, to judge by the portion already finished, will form a magnificent promenade, giving far finer views of the loch than was possible before, owing to its greater height.
