The Necessary Button Once An Ornament

Not even the button is exempt from the fate of fortune that has followed nearly everything else that people buy in recent years. It has doubled in price according to a statement by Irving Crane of the Associated Clothing Manufacturers of New York. But probably it has not carried a corresponding advance in the price of a suit of clothes as the buttons are not used any more as ornaments, at least on men's apparel and a couple of dozen of them are all anybody needs for the purpose of keeping his clothes together. Time was when the buttons were more expensive than the cloth itself, when they were considered as ornamental as precious stones and the presence of paste buttons to-day recalls the fact that once there were buttons of diamonds. Before the Norman conquest buttons were unknown in England where the rude forefathers probably kept their garments together with strings of knots and for some time after their introduction from the continent they were purely decorative. It was in the seventeenth century that the manufacture of buttons became an industry which was later to become an important one in Birmingham, whence they went to all parts of the world.

Protecting Buttons.

But in the reigns of Charles II and William and Mary the manufacture of buttons was an infant industry which was encouraged by law. Foreign buttons were forbidden and the importer of them could be fined £10 and the wearer of a buttoned coat or waistcoat which made it impossible for a tailor to obtain payment for a coat that had cloth buttons. The object of this law was to protect the metal button trade which was then developing. In 1790 the process of dipping buttons so that they became gilt was discovered and another convulsion shook the industry. It was argued that buttons should not be described as gilt or plated unless they were jackets of gold or silver and were not merely dipped. Before the middle of the nineteenth century the metal button had fallen into disfavor and not long afterward the vegetable button was discovered. It was mainly responsible for the decline of the important Birmingham industry.

The Vegetable and Pearl Buttons.

The best vegetable buttons were made out of the Curuzo nut of South America. The shell of this nut is lighter and more pliable than ivory besides being much cheaper. It also lends itself to dyeing. Next came the pearl button. It is of the same material as that most of pearl forms the substance of most pearl buttons; but the category of mother-of-pearl may not be entirely familiar to the laity. The most beautiful pearl buttons are produced in the Maldives, which come from Macassar shells found in the seas of the East Indies. These shells are not the shells of the pearl oyster, but of the woman of fashion. They are the purest and they are the largest pearl shells in the world. So it is quite safe when you hear the hucksters crying "Genuine pearl necklaces, only a dollar!" to assume that these itinerant salesmen have not heard the name "Macassar." The really popular fellow hails from the Pacific Ocean and is named "Black Shell. He is of an exquisitely dark shade, full of rainbow tints." Portions of his shell go into the making of choice white buttons whose clear, flat, second only to that of the pearl button. During the most energetic period of the pearl button industry a Birmingham about 3,000 hands were engaged. There were besides at least 10 small numbers of pearl buttons. The American War of Independence, however killed the export trade. At that time Birmingham had overpowered rivals in the French who manufactured buttons, also in the Vienna, says the New York Times. The "oval chuck" was invented by a man named Bedley, who had also some appliances by means of which button-making was simplified. Matthew Boulton, in 1745, originated snail and steel buttons. A little later, papier-mache and slate came into use. A ripple was caused by the appearance of a button heretofore unheard of—a covered button possessing an iron shank through which a needle could be filed in any direction.

Buttons in America. In 1837, William Elliott introduced a button made of silk, following this were debatable materials; but they proved themselves weak in service, for their edges would grow frayed by buttoning and unbuttoning. This led to the invention of the corded edge button. Porcelain buttons appeared in 1840. An epitome of the button industry in Europe shows that Birmingham was the home of button making; that Paris became a world button market, but turned out specialties; that Germany copied the high-class articles of both England and France, making a much cheaper grade of buttons; that Czechoslovakia produced ornaments of fancy glass buttons; that Vienna was active in the pearl button industry, at one time attaining nearly to the status of Birmingham; but Milan also specialized on a small scale; that London, while active did not develop her trade to the standard of that of Birmingham. Casper Wistar was the pioneer in America. He introduced the brass button in 1750. Henry Wetman followed him and this came Benjamin Handolph, Leeds, Mass., by A. W. Critchlow, the metal button industry on this side of the Atlantic was really born in Waterbury, Conn., in 1800. In 1859, the vegetable button was first made in the United States at Lowell, Mass., by A. W. Critchlow, an Englishman. In 1862, Newark, N. J., tried to manufacture composition buttons to overcome the mechanical problem but was unsuccessful. The following year a New Yorker, Isaac Smith got in touch with the Dickinson Hard Rubber Company of Springfield, Mass and together they improved upon the button making machinery. Since then, manufactured there.
