Will test effects
Of drunken driving

KANSAS CITY, Nov. 18 (AP)—Thirty-seven human guinea pigs with a taste for liquor submitted themselves to science today to give police authentic information on alcohol's effect on motorists.

The volunteers, all men, will drink highballs, or beer (the police supply the intoxicants) at half-hour intervals while undergoing rigid examinations of their driving ability. Tests to make sure each subject drains his glass, a policeman will be his constant companion.

Each volunteer will drink and drive until disqualified—or he gets pulled to take the wheel.

The police, learning many of their subjects planned to fortify themselves with huge steak dinners as cushions against the effects of the alcohol, ordered the volunteers to report 5 to 1-2 hours before the tests began.

The tests, explained Henry W. Johnson, head of the police traffic and safety division, were designed as a fair and impartial examination of alcohol's effect on drivers—not the effects of alcoholic antidotes and remedies.

Each driver will undergo a thorough physical examination. He will be handed two ounces of whiskey and given 10 minutes to drink it. Then he must drive a car forward and backward a distance of 200 feet, keeping the wheels within a 12-inch strip. He must drive a figure eight course marked by 10 posts set nine feet apart. This maneuver must be completed satisfactorily within three minutes.

At half-hour intervals each driver will down two more ounces of whiskey and repeat the driving performance.

Frequent examinations will be made with a drumkometer and upon the subjects' eyes, blood, reflex action, blood pressure and his facilities of observation and coordination.

Part of the tests will be for beer drinkers only.

After it's all over an officer will escort each driver to his home and explain, if necessary to his wife that her timpling husband got that way all in the interests of science and safe driving.

CHAPTER XI
NEW HANDS IN THE GAME

Alison was not the sort of girl to give way to panic. She realized at once that, although she could see the stranger's face plainly by the light inside the room, she herself, hidden among the bushes in the darkness, must be invisible to him. He was handsome in a coarse way, yet there was something repellent about him.

When Alison had first seen the light in the window she had taken it for granted that a tramp had taken refuge in the house for the night. It was very certain that none of the local people would have entered it even in broad daylight. But this stranger was no tramp. He wore a decent suit of blue serge with a double-breasted jacket and on his head was a sailor's cap stuck rakishly askew. Alison turned her attention to the other, smaller man who was sitting on the upturned packing case. He had his back to her and seemed to be writing on a pad or in a book which he held on his knee. A small electric lamp gave light for his task. About him there was something familiar. Suddenly he raised his head and half turned in the direction of the big man. Alison got a second shock. It was Bert Spinner.

If there was any person of her acquaintance whom Alison disliked more than Rufus Cowell it was Bert Spinner. She really knew very little about him except that he had an office at Brixham and called himself a marine agent, whatever that might be. Her dislike for him was instinctive and resembled the horror with which some people regard a spider or a snake.

The sight of him at Fammers filled her with a feeling that was nearly unbearable. She could not imagine how he had hidden the gold. She felt certain that no one had watched her that night when she had put it away. And even if she had been seen going to the place, she could not imagine how any eyes could have watched her while she had hidden the gold. Stepping back a little so that she was quite among the bushes, she heaved, she stood very still and waited.

"Have you finished, Bert?" the big man asked in a deep, resonant voice.

"I wish you'd hurry, I'm fed up," Alison was puzzled. She could not imagine what Spinner was about. If he had found the gold, surely he would have taken it if he had not been waiting for her. Actually he was sitting still and making notes.

"Presently he got up.

"I'm going into the back room, Moat," he said, and picked up the lamp. Moat followed him and still Alison waited.

It long passed but there was no sign of the men. The light moved from one room to another and, finally disappeared. But the men did not come out.

It was late. Alison was afraid that she would be missed. The last thing she wanted was awkward questions from her stepfather or from Eliza. She decided that she had better go home and wait till the next evening to recover the gold. Whatever Spinner and Moat were doing, it did not seem to her that they were searching for the gold, but even if they were, she hardly thought that they would find it.

She slipped away very quietly. A thin film of cloud had drifted up out of the south, and she had hidden the stars. It was very dark under the trees and Alison had to pick her way with care. There was not a breath of wind and the trees, by their rustling thorns of a Bramble. She stooped to release it and, as she did so, a dry stick cracked behind her. In the silence the small sound seemed almost deafening. Alison's heart gave a thump that she could hear plainly. She straightened her long, lithe body and stood like a statue, her hands behind her, listening with all her power of hearing. The noise was not repeated, nor was there any other sound at all.

"Some wild thing," she said to herself, and presently moved onwards silent as any ghost.

It was just ten when she reached Skardon. The lamp in the living room had been turned low and the house was as quiet as the wood. Evidently her stepfather had gone to bed. Alison put out the lamp, took a candle and went through into the kitchen. That room, too, was empty. Eliza had gone up. Alison went into the back room, where she had hidden the gold. She was feelingly remembered by Messrs. John Bears and Willard Bruce.

The pall bearers were: George Bears, Norman MacPherson (grandson of the deceased), John Bears, Archie MacDonnell, Jack MacKinnon, Willard Bruce.

At the service in St. Andrew's Church, Cardigan of which Mr. MacPherson was a faithful member, the following hymns were sung: "The Lord's My Shepherd," "Asleep in Jesus," "There Is No Night in Heaven."

The pallbearers were: Oliver Doerflinger, Hugh MacEachern, P. J. Starkey, T. J. Flynn, John Ploger, Dan Shaw.

L., was held in the League hall on Tuesday Nov. 11th at 8 o'clock p.m. Mrs. George Campbell presided, and opened the meeting with the League prayer. The Secretary's report was read by Mrs. P. A. MacDonald, who also read the correspondence, the resolution passed by the previous convention and the list of banned magazines. The correspondence consisted of letters from Mrs. Bernard Convent of Sisters of Martha, Mrs. D. P. McNeill, Convener of Sisters of Service, Mrs. A. A. McInnis, Diocesan President and a letter of thanks from the Sisters of St. Mary's Convent for a donation of fifty dollars from the League. The Treasurer's report was read by Mrs. M. Murray, the parents, proposed by Gordon Godfrey and responded to by Mr. Elphinstone Howatt. A hearty sing song followed and after quiet music the Chief Ranger led the devotional period. Then the minister, Rev. L. M. Murray outlined the work being attempted in the training of boys and girls and pointed out that the Church was trying to meet their deepest needs. QUEEN'S CANADIAN FUND DONATIONS

Repeated bombing raids on British port areas and the industrial midlands has attracted fresh attention to the frightful suffering of the many thousands of civilians in Great Britain who are harried from shelter to shelter and finally driven into the open country by successive raids. Eventually places are found for them all places of relative security, but their belongings of all kinds are destroyed. The task of emergency feeding alone is difficult. The task of setting them up once more with some quantity of clothing and bedding is much more difficult.

To meet these enormous needs, funds have been started in various parts of the world. Her Majesty the larger, got herself a glass of milk, then climbed the stairs to her room.

She was firmly resolved that she would put the whole thing out of her mind and go to sleep, but it proved impossible. For hours she lay wondering what the unpleasant Spinner and his companion were going to do with her. When she did at last doze off her dreams were haunted by the face of that tall, dark, evil-looking man whose name was Moat.

"I was, tired, but a cold bath braced her, and she was her bright self when she came down in the morning. Eliza, grim as ever, told her that the master was staying in bed for the space inside was about a "You'll have to get your own," she added.

This did not worry Alison. Indeed it pleased her for she was not anxious to see her stepfather until she had secured the gold and put it safely in the bank.

She spent a busy day attending to her chickens, and in the garden. It was late dusk when she set out for rammers. There had been a breeze in the afternoon but that had died out and the wood was as peacefully still as on the previous night. Alison approached with the utmost caution but now there was no light, nor any sign of life about the dreary house. Even so, she waited for a long time among the elder bushes before she ventured to creep through a gap in the broken fence and approach the place. Again she paused under a laurel bush by the wall and listened. The only sound was the high-pitched note of a bat hawking over the deserted garden and, satisfied at last, Alison got through a window into the house.

She had brought a small torch and, switching it on, noticed used matches and ash from a pipe on the dusty floor of the sitting room. She went through into the kitchen, a big square room with a rusty range set in a deep recess. Once more she stood listening until she was certain that there was no one near, then she went into the recess and opened the iron door of the old-fashioned brick oven. The space inside was about a yard in diameter and a flue went up from it into the kitchen chimney.

She shone her light into this flue and reached up. Her hand came back empty. The package in which she had wrapped the torque was no longer there!
