CHAPTER XXII
TWO IN TROUBLE

Mrs. Mead was a capital cook and Crispin won her heart by declaring that he had never tasted anything so good as her meat cakes. Devonshire cream and whortleberry jam. Actually he had rarely enjoyed a meal more than this tea at Clatworthy eaten in the ancient, celloided kitchen.

The Meads were real old-fashioned Moor folk, shy as a rule with strangers but the best of friends when they take a visitor. Crispin found himself telling them all about Roseworthy and he even confided to Mrs. Mead that he was engaged to Alison Dane. Mrs. Mead, who had met Alison in the market and, like everyone else, loved her, was delighted.

"You two will surely make a handsome couple," she declared so warmly that Crispin got quite red. Then suddenly he jumped up.

"Mr. Mead, I have three trout to catch and it's six o'clock."

"Don't be worried, I'll show 'em where the big uns be," Mead answered. He got up and put on his hat. Crispin shook hands with Mrs. Mead and told her he was coming back someday for another tea.

"What's the name of any time you'm a mind to see her again?" Crispin picked up his hat and followed Mead to the door.

Mead took him up stream and Crispin found himself on the rim of a forty-foot cliff with the river roaring below.

"What's the good of this?" he asked sharply. "Can't get down there?"

"Don't be fret," Mead answered. "I'll show 'em the way down." He went on and presently they came to a great spill in the cliff, a gorge running at right angles to the main cliff.

"The sides of this were steep, but Mead started down and Crispin found no difficulty in following. In a few minutes they were standing at the edge of a great black pool quite fifty yards long where the water bubbled and swirled under the drive of the heavy sledge at the top. And all along the near side ran a ledge of rock, high enough to be enough for any active person to find footing.

"Man alive, I never saw a more perfect pool in my life!" cried Crispin.

"I thought her'd please 'ee" said Mead. There hadn't many had fished it and I'll see there's trout here half as long as my arm. Now I got to go back to rick milking but, when you've done, you come to the house and there'll be a pony ready for 'ee."

Left alone, Crispin got to work at once and at his second cast he was into a fish which took the line with a splash. The light rod bent almost double and Crispin was thrilled to the marrow as he realized that he had hooked a fish that probably weighed as much as the whole nine he had already in his creel.

It leaped and the pale light glistened on a great silvery creature a foot and a half in length. It was a ledge of rock, high enough to be almost double and Crispin was thrilled to the marrow as he realized that he had hooked a fish that probably weighed as much as the whole nine he had already in his creel.

and knocked him out. "Fallen!" He looked up.

"That never fell," he said to himself. "Not by itself. It was pushed."

He began to realize that someone had deliberately tried to murder him, and his thoughts at once flew to Rufus. He wondered if the fellow was still up at the top there, watching.

"I'd no idea he was fit to travel."

"He was not. He would never have gone if I had been at home. I'm very troubled, Dick, and Eliza is frantic."

"Do you know why he went?"

"I do. Eliza has told me. She gave him the good ornaments and he went to sell them so as to pay Cowell." Dick whistled softly.

"So Eliza has had them all this time and now someone has seen 'em?"

"I'll lay it was Rufus," he added. "That's what I think. Rufus was in Newton this morning. I inquired on my way through the station. 'Did you ring up Plymouth?' 'No. Both boxes at the station were occupied so I came straight on.'"

"Then I'll do it at once. Come in and sit down. Let me give you a glass of sherry."

"Thank you, please," Alison begged. "The poor old man may be hurt or even dead."

Dick got busy at once. He rang up the Plymouth police, he described Burt and asked if there was any news of him.

There was a long delay then at last a sergeant spoke.

"Mr. Burt is in the Millbay Hospital. He had a fall in Millbay Station just after the arrival of the 1.10 train. The hospital authorities discovered his body from his pocket book and tried to ring up his home but apparently his house is not on the telephone. They have therefore communicated through the Newton A. B. police who promised to send word to Mr. Burt's house at Skardon."

"Is he badly hurt?" Dick asked.

"You must ring up the hospital please. I will give you the number."

Dick got the hospital but again there was delay before the matron could come to the phone.

"He is not badly hurt," she told Dick. "but he has had a severe shock and is in a very weak state. He was unconscious for some hours. It will be well for any relative to come to him as soon as possible."

"Thank you, please," Dick asked. "whether he had any suitcase or bag with him?"

"Nothing of that sort, but he has been asking about a small case which he was carrying. His loss seems to have upset him very greatly." Dick thanked her.

"Miss Dane, Mr. Burt's step-daughter is here. She will cover over first thing in the morning." He hung up.

"Alison, you must stay the night here and Crispin will drive you over in the morning." Alison was looking at the clock.

"It's nearly nine, Dick. What has become of Crispin?"

CHAPTER XXIII
NO ACCIDENT THIS!

It is a nasty business coming round after being knocked out. It took Crispin several ugly moments before he realized where he was or what had happened. Then he hauled himself up out of the water and stood on the ledge.

His head was still spinning and feeling it gingerly, he found a large lump just above his left ear. He realized what had happened. A huge boulder had fallen from the top of the cliff and missed him by a matter of a few feet only. A piece broken from it had hit him.

"Yes, she's here. Things have been happening. She'll tell you. Let me take that best of yours. I suppose the car's bust."

"Car's all right, Dick. But you're right about things having happened. As a vye a yam to spin as well as you."

"Crispin stepped into the house there was Alison. Her cheeks paled as she saw the bandage round his head.

"You're hurt, Crispin."

"Nothing to make a song about, dearest. Really a trifle. I'm so wet and dirty I can't kiss you. I'll run up and change, then want to hear what's been happening. Dick says there have been doings."

Once in his room, Crispin changed in record time. Coming down he found Alison in the dining-room; she had just brought in some hot soup. She looked at him anxiously.

"Was it the car?" she asked.

"I think it was Rufus," Crispin answered. "But first tell me what brings you here—I've had supper" he added.

"You'll take this soup first," said Alison firmly. Crispin chuckled.

"You're starting right, my dear," he said, and sat down meekly. Dick came in and, while Crispin absorbed his soup, Alison told him of her stepfather's visit to Plymouth and of the robbery of the gold.

"We're almost certain it was Rufus," she ended. "We know he went to Plymouth and already returned." Crispin looked thoughtful.

"In that case it's somebody else I have to thank for trying to murder me," he remarked. Alison paled again.

"Tried to murder you!" she repeated.

"It's all right, darling. He didn't succeed—as you can see for yourself. I'll tell you all about it."

The absolute silence of his two listeners showed how deeply interested they were in his story. When he reached the point of coming to himself, half in the water, half out, Alison shivered.

"If you'd talk the other way," she said in a very low voice.

"But I didn't, dearest. And Mead and I is some alone with a rope and hauled me up the bank. They really are good people. They gave me supper and tied up my head and lent me a horse."

"But why didn't you leave the house of the inn at Tamerford?" Dick asked. "And come in your car?"

"Because I want my murderer to be caught," Crispin answered. "Then if he saw me alive he might get such a fright he'd give himself away." He nodded. "But if it wasn't Rufus, who's the murderer?"

"It was Spinner," Alison said
