AN APOLOGY

Beautiful Snow, some months ago I cursed thee deep and cursed thee low. Beautiful Snow, wert thou here to day, Ah, many the beautiful word I'd say!

"Cassler makes mountains out of molehills." "Yes, he is the writer of advertising circulars for a picturesque summer resort."

"Is your husband a vegetarian?" "I can't even get him to cut the lawn, let alone dig a garden."

"Say, Weary, what did they do at that last laundry you tackled?" "Event'ing. First dey collared me, den dey cuffed me, and den they took dey starch outer me!"

"Was Tortured with Rheumatism Years. Ended Quick. New Man."

Tried Everything. No Help Till Took "FRUIT-A-TIVES."

"I tried a dozen different treatments and nothing seemed to help. At last decided to try 'Fruit-a-lives'. For the first time wonderful relief."

Married Quarters

"Oh, she isn't at the eloping point yet," said Lady Augusta drily. "And I think out of consideration for Miss Bradford, I ought to make it Monday. She has taken a very long, tiresome journey for no reason that I can see but pure humanity. She loves Poppy, and apparently sees a good deal of her. We must be very kind to her to mark our gratitude, and if I can persuade her to stay till Monday no harm will be done. I am sure. Besides, Saturday night is a rather ghastly time to arrive anywhere. I have thought we might go to London to-morrow evening and sleep at Brown's Hotel going into Yorkshire on Monday morning. The days are so short now; it will be a better arrangement; but I haven't mentioned it to Miss Bradford yet. If you are ready to see her, Edward I'll go and bring her down now."

from the comfortable chintz-covered chair by the wood fire and smiled at her hostess. She had made no dinner toilet, but her frock of soft dove-grey cashmere, so quaintly fashioned with a gathered skirt and full sleeves, and worn with a little turnover collar and cuffs of exquisite hand-embroidered lawn, part of the treasure found in mysterious boxes and drawers under the eaves, made her look like an old picture. "I couldn't change," she murmured, observing that Lady Augusta wore a long-trained gown of very stiff black brocade.

"Change! Why would you change? You look positively lovely. I'm studying your gown. Why don't we all wear something like that? It would simplify life. You could go simply anywhere dressed like that, and always look right, besides being a joy to behold." "Oh, don't say things like that," said Naomi with rather a shy smile. "I make my frocks myself. I copied the design from an old Quaker print. You see, we were originally Quakers." "But how very interesting! Such sweet, quaint people the Quakers, and always genteel," she said in tones of satisfaction. While in the hands of her maid she had been rehearsing the new role she intended to play. It is to be feared that Naomi's sweet personality and the report the Rector had unwillingly given regarding Poppy's husband raised her hopes rather high. Now Naomi gave her a new note to play upon. She could imagine herself explaining the Bradfords, where explanation seemed politic, as "a very old Yorkshire Quaker family."

"Dear me, how wonderful! How very good you must be! I suppose Quakers are like that. I'm afraid we are less strict in observances." "It is perhaps only because there never has been any necessity for Sunday travel in my case," said Naomi. "I quite see that it would be better to arrive at Margate earlier in the day than we could possibly do by making the double journey in one day. It is possible to get across country; I looked up the trains, but nothing was to be gained by it. It was easier to go to London and start afresh."

"Oh, I know these ghastly cross-country journeys—I have suffered from them," said Lady Augusta. "Then shall we make that arrangement! It will give the Rector and myself the greatest pleasure to entertain you till Sunday, and we both hope it will not be the last time."

"Thank you very much; but I shall have to let my niece, Mrs. Bishop, know that I am not coming, or she will be most anxious. You see, she has not the slightest idea where I have gone."

"You could wire to her in the morning." "Couldn't I write a note? I don't wish to say where I am by telegram. You see, one can't explain things in a telegram. I could say to Mary in a note that I am here, and why. She would keep her own counsel, but a telegram somehow always seems to be public property."

"I don't wish Poppy to know I am coming; I particularly wish to arrive without warning, because it will give me a better idea of how things actually stand," said Lady Augusta. "If you will write a note to your niece now before we go down, I will send one of the men to post it on the mail train at Pishetts, then she will be quite certain to have it early to-morrow."

"Very well, if you are not waiting for me now, I will do that," said Naomi; and Lady Augusta left her to write to Mary Bishop on a sheet of hand-made paper with Cudham Abbey in delicate mauve in one corner and a very small Pomeroy crest on the flap of the envelope.

MOUNTIES SAIL FOR FAR NORTH

NORTH SYDNEY, N. S., Aug. 7.—Sailing recently on the S. S. Beothic, was a detachment of Royal Canadian Mounted Police enroute to the eastern Arctic archipelago, where they will spend two years, before again returning to civilization. Corporal Jacobs and Constables Dersch and Margets were the first of the detachment to reach North Sydney. They were followed by Constable Foster, of Fredericton, and later by Inspector Joy, with the balance of the party which numbers twelve men.

The Beothic also carried supplies for the various mounted police posts in the eastern Arctic archipelago and will bring out the members of the force which the present party is going in to relieve. The life of the mounted policemen in the Arctic is very arduous as described by one of the party. When they reach the main supply post they will be broken up into parties of two which will patrol their respective routes. Each member of the force is supplied with a large snow knife and when on the trail when making camp at night they seek a spot where there is good pack snow and from this cut out blocks with which to make an igloo. These snow houses when first made offer no other ventilation than that which comes in through the blocks of snow, the doorway being closed up after the occupants get inside. After a while the moisture from the breathing and also the heat from the fire causes a coating of ice to form on both sides and it is necessary to punch a hole through the top. They are made large enough to accommodate a man comfortably in a sleeping posture.

The food usually taken on the trail is bacon and dried caribou meat, beans, coffee, tea and sugar. They dress in fur coats similar to the Eskimos and each of the parties has an Eskimo guide and interpreter attached. These guides acquire a position of authority among their own kind and they are all anxious to work for the police.

In the early days infanticide was practiced by the Eskimos when hunting was bad. This has been largely stamped out through the efforts of the police who stock emergency relief rations at strategic points to supply the Eskimos when times are bad. One of the members of the party was present at the hanging of the two Eskimos who murdered one of the police, and he stated that it had a very salutary effect on the natives. The whole village was gathered together and the reason for the execution was explained to them through an interpreter. He remarked that the Eskimos are rapidly assimilating the idea that the white man's law must prevail.

Asked if there was any lawlessness in the country he stated that the Eskimos on the whole were very orderly and that if anyone broke the law it was very hard matter to escape punishment, particularly in cases of capital crimes, as it was impossible to get out of the country without coming in contact with one or another of the natives, and in this way the police are able to trace the movement of the culprit.

He referred to the peculiar way in which news seems to travel in the Arctic, stating that he had had several demonstrations of the quickness with which it is carried by what is known as "moccasin" route. Just how the news travels so quickly is a mystery. Whether it is telepathy or some sort of signals system, the police
