The Girl Who Had No Chance

My MARION RUBINCAM

THE REAL CHANCE

Chapter 113
She stood there until she heard the door close leading into the corridor. Then she guessed Tim had gone. She walked into the living room then, and stood looking at the blank closed door. Tim had gone—this time forever. And she wasn't sorry, except for the illusion that died that night. Tim had gone—she would never see him again. She would never see Myra either. She would go on back to Marketown, and keep her work there, she would be a success—so much she would be a success—so with his work in the city—and would not be a success. Somehow, it wasn't in him. She couldn't tell why, she simply knew it. She was sure Gabrielle Cartez had summed up the whole affair very well indeed. Once more she went into her own room and summoned Marie. Then she undressed and slipped into the lovely clinging white gown that she adored and Marie took down her hair and braided it for the night. "Anything else, Madame?" she asked. Ruth shook her head. "No, Marie. You've been very nice to me since I've stayed here." The maid smiled. "Madame has been very generous. But I like to serve Madame—I do it for the pleasure of it, not for Madame's money." Ruth sat in the chair before the dressing table and smiled a little wistfully at the Frenchwoman. "If you find pleasure in serving me," she said, "do you want to come home with me as my maid? I'm going back in a week if I can get through all my business. And I'll need a maid." She did not know why she said that. After all, what would she do with Marie in the big, old-fashioned, ugly house in Marketown? But Marie represented the most human and kindly thing she had met in New York—always excepting Gaby. But Marie shook her head. "No Madame," she said. "I like the city. It is noise, it is excitement. It has music, it has movies, it has crowds that laugh on the streets, this hotel is noisy. The chances are in the city, Madame!" "Are they?" Ruth asked, but turned away without waiting for the answer and walked into the living room again. Somehow Marie's refusal to go with her annoyed her. Yet what would she have done with her? could not picture her in her mother's house—then she realized that unconsciously all along, she had been thinking of a white house on top of a hill, a spacious old farmhouse remodeled into the acme of today's comfort, a place of large windows and sloping lawns and great trees a place where the cool breezes swept the piazzas, and where one could sit and watch, far down the valley, the thriving town that was growing.

She stopped, startled at her own thoughts. How had such a house come to her mind? Where was there such a place? She only knew one house on a hill—that was the old farm Langley had purchased cheaply. And it had none of the little luxuries she delighted in, it was a great bare, rambling farmhouse.

But of course it could be done over! And it did overlook the valley where Marketown lay and particularly where the new model factory town was building—Langley! Had he bought that with the idea that they would marry and live there? She went over to her desk and pulled out a letter to him—a letter started some time ago and never finished. She read it over again, and tore it up—what was the use? She told him she did love him and she told him she didn't. She couldn't finish it now. The letter was all doubt and indecision. Now she knew—she thought she knew. And there was Marie saying good-night and slipping out through the living room door into the corridor. Perhaps Marie would like the big white house on the hill. She belonged in such a place, she was the ideal maid for a smart residence. What did she mean by saying that the chances were all in the big city?
