Happenings of The Week

Princess Margaret celebrated her coming of age Saturday at a family dinner dance where the young Marquis of Blandford, often rumored as her favorite suitor, was among the special guests. The occasion of her 18th birthday was an important one for Margaret, called "world's most wanted" teen-ager. It meant that she now may be chosen as a Counsellor of State, acting for the King in the event of his illness or absence from the country.

It meant also that she took her place in the line of succession to the Throne and could succeed the King and Princess Elizabeth in the event of their deaths, although the heiress-presumptive has no children. The coming of age means more social responsibilities for Margaret—taking a more active role in state and court affairs henceforth.

Princess Margaret celebrated at Balmoral Castle in Scotland, where the family is on vacation from court duties. Guests beside her handsome, 22-year-old Blandford, included Winston Churchill, Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip. The Duke and Duchess of Gloucester and their sons, Prince William and Prince Richard, were guests for afternoon tea.

The Princess spent the morning reading hundreds of congratulatory letters and telegrams from all parts of the world. She picked up a few birthday gifts, too, although the court office wouldn't say what they were. No one in the court knew who was talking about the Princess' friendship with young Blandford, but the tall young peer was being mentioned exclusively in British Press speculation about romance in Margaret's life. She is going to The Netherlands as the King's deputy at the inauguration of Princess Juliana, succeeding Queen Wilhelmina on the Dutch Throne.

That Body Of Yours

By James W. Barlow, M. D.

THE YEARS AFTER FIFTY

Men and women have stopped talking about their operations, especially about appendicitis, and now talk about their high blood pressure as if it were a disease like pneumonia. What many of us fail to remember is that high blood pressure is just a symptom showing that something is wrong; and that nature, by raising the blood pressure, is helping us to fight off whatever it is.

In his book, "The Years After Fifty," Dr. Wingate M. Johnson, Professor of Clinical Medicine, Wake Forest College, reminds us that James MacKenzie, a family physician who taught us more about the heart than any other one physician, attached little importance to blood pressure reading. Also, that Dr. H. A. Christian, of Boston, once stated that he believed that the invention of blood pressure apparatus has done mankind more harm than good.

As a matter of fact, the invention of the blood pressure apparatus has done much for the medical profession. In that physicians can read exactly the condition of the blood pressure. If it is too low, it is as serious a sign as being too high. The point, however, is that patients and the public generally think of high blood pressure as a disease instead of a symptom.

"If an individual who is always thinking of his body and possible ailments meets a doctor who insists on taking the victim's pulse and that his misery were ended quickly."

This doesn't mean that blood pressure is not important; high blood pressure is killing off men and women with heart strokes and brain strokes than any other condition. What is meant is that, as something is causing high blood pressure, it is killing off men and women with heart strokes and brain strokes than any other condition. If possible, trying to reduce high blood pressure without finding the cause, is wasting valuable time. As with any ailment, the cause should be always investigated first.

The causes of high blood pressure, according to Dr. Johnson are: (a) heredity, (b) emotional strain and disturbance, (c) over-eating, (d) mental and physical overwork, (e) infections.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

Unhappy Brides

Early Months Of Marriage Often Bring Bitter Tears Of Disillusionment

A young girl, who has been married all of six months, writes a tearful letter to this column in which she says she is terribly disappointed in marriage. She says that marriage isn't what she thought it would be, and that her husband doesn't come up to expectations. She thought it would be a lot of fun to have a swanky wedding and lots of bridal presents and a cute little home with brand new furniture, and not to have to worry about dates because she had a husband who would take her stepping every night. But it hasn't turned out that way at all.

She admits that, of course, most of the young wives she knows are not living the life of Riley. Their husbands are wearing out and they are beginning to look rather shabby, and they are spending their afternoons over the cooking stove instead of the bridge table, and a lot of them are tied down with babies. And bitterest disappointment of all, their husbands no longer spend their time telling them how beautiful and wonderful and adorable they are, they say things about the cooking that no bride ever expected to hear.

So the young wife, who was so sure that no matter what other women's marriages might be going to be all pie, weeps the

Ellen's Diary

By an Island Farmer's Wife

But Jamie and I did not reach the other farm last evening. When we came as far as Rob's on our way there, Jamie's brother, whom we called "the grand-daddy" was miserable, so we remained with Karoly overnight. It seems that at present a sickness is prevalent among children which strikes suddenly and with more or less indisposition. Grand-daddy himself was taken ill on an evening of this week, but recovered quickly and was back to her usual self by the next day. And now Gage was sick, so with his mother we kept a quiet vigil over the youngster a small lad, his body burning with fever, cheeks flushed in an uneasy sleep. Some-thing of a ghost of a smile played over his features, usually sunny and one wondered if indeed it might be true that he was "talking with angels." But Karoly, with long with angelic smiles. Karoly whispered once in a voice that disregarded my presence. Perhaps she too was wondering as mothers will, though neither of us mentioned our fears.

Strange things come to mind in such silent watches—old scenes return to comfort or alarm. One of the long ago came back to me, holding him closely as grand-daddy does her doll, rocking him to sleep. And an old lady who had given up more than one of her visits at the time, sat placidly knitting. As she stopped to capture a dropped stitch in the long stocking she was fashioning on her needles, she remarked, "It's not you must never set too much store by your baby. Very little can take him away, and leave your arms sadly empty. I thought, at nothing could take mine from me. You must never think a night's absence and renewing many friendships. Mrs. Currier is a daughter of her host, Mr. Alfred Duchemin and Mr. H. P. Duchemin, now summering at Fortuna.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles K. Martin, Haverhill, Mass., who have been visiting Mrs. Martin's mother, Mrs. J. T. Inman, St. Catharines, left on return Wednesday morning and Thursday were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. McFadyen, Ritz Apts. and Mr. and Mrs. Stirling Inman, Hillcrest Avenue.

We watched the clock Karoly and sometimes Rob, and I for medicine-hours and gave the baby cooling drinks at the least indication of thirst. Once Karoly said, "One would never think a night's absence so long!" So slow the night hours are in sickness but swift passing to those who may rest. The moon lowered and faded to twilight and the welcome bright streak of dawn—and now a wee lad had fallen into a cooler, refreshing sleep. He is better than youngest one of our grand-children and Karoly reports "getting pretty hungry" on his present liquid diet. The peace and benediction of tonight will bless the family at Rob's as well as the quiet farmhouse in this quiet country-side.

A rare visitor among other interesting and most welcome ones from distant lands, was great-grandmother to our small ones. She continues to be as brisk as a bee, this small dark-eyed lady who visited us at Alderley today. She is wise in her long years of experience with living, kind "to a fault" we say, and as always her the makings of a chuckle with her. She accepted a slip of cloth or that plant to add to a precious and blossom profusely in token of her green fingers; she came with me to explain over the fine growth of a lime tree, the fine kin to a widespread one on the lawn at "home"; she must view Jeanie's two ducks and look in on Jack's pen of fattening hogs, much interested as always in the affairs of farming. . . . And another week is slipping away to join past ones, a week that has been lovely, and most kind to us folks at Alderley, not however strictly free from concerns but at the same time good. In review one finds much for which to be thankful, indeed so much that it would be futile to commence the least of which are the familiar sights and sounds which one is apt to take for granted, not realizing how beautiful and pleasant they are. How innumerable, and altogether delightful, the little things of our daily round! Tonight, in the peace and hush of the pre-Sabbath one would think of these things.

"I thank Thee, Lord for little things."

The rainbow on a pigeon's wings. The dewy prayer that's offered up within a purple crows-cup. For shadows on a soaring hill, And rusky pools beneath a mill; For sunlit clouds that sail the sky, And lonely curlew's nesting cry— Grant, Lord, despite a world in pain, That these, Thy little things, remain."

Until Monday—Diary—Good-night.

Among them she recognized several who had worked with her overseas during the last war. The Canadian Girls served in Europe and the Far East—I had some of them with me in Malaya," she said. As Dame Grand Cross of the Order of St. John she was dressed in the order's summer uniform of black shantung.

Five rows of military ribbons brightened the sober two-piece suit. For the benefit of "new look" experts the skirt was not more than three inches below the knee.

Countess Mountbatten paid special tribute to the work overseas of Margaret MacLaren, lady superintendent-in-chief of St. John for Canada. "I can never tell you how much we welcomed having Miss MacLaren with us," she said.

When Rex Barbour told a story you listened whether you wanted to or not.

"I went up to the clerk in his hotel," Rex was saying, "and I said, 'Look here, my good man, have you a little back room?' Something my chauffeur could use? Something for about $2? And the clerk looked at his cards and answered: 'Why, yes, Mr. Barbour, I think we can take care of your servant.' So I said: 'Good. I'll take that room myself and let the chauffeur sleep in the car.'"

"Well, dear, and what did mamma's little baby learn in school today?"

"I learnt two kids not to call me 'mamma's little baby'!"

The Stars Say—

By Genevieve Kemble

For Sunday, August 29

SUNDAY'S horoscope hints of peculiar adventures or contacts of a reactionary or disturbing nature, probably conducive to restlessness, strange urges or eccentricities. These may incline to travel, change or estrangements. Offsetting this, the mind is bent toward reflection, serious insight and a sound analysis of the unsettling conditions. With composure and refraining from impulsive moves all may be well.

If It Is Your Birthday

Those whose birthday it is may have a rather strange period in which a strong inner urge to make radical changes, with possible estrangements or separations, may be happily adjusted by reserve forces, or a deep analysis of underlying circumstances. There will be an indefinable drive for action, but such should be calmly evaluated as to pros and cons before final decisions are made. A child born on this day may want frequent change and adventure, because of restlessness and emotional urges. Its impulsive nature could be successfully stabilized by pause to reflect on consequences.

For Monday, August 30

MONDAY'S astrological forecast is for a show of resistance to stable or congested conditions, in which important ambitions or objectives have been held up. With a determined effort, concentrated energies and a drawing on reserve forces, much progress is in sight. However, it might be easy to complicate matters by resort to some forms of expediency or crafty manipulation of under cover opportunities. Danger may be averted by sound conduct and straight forward conduct.

If It Is Your Birthday

Those whose birthday it is may find a show of resistance to stable and congested situations, by a resort to reserve forces and the straight forward management of peculiar or involved circumstances and a drawing on reserve forces or duplicity could add to complications and thus forfeit collaboration from high places. Study cautiously, plumb the depths, then move with precision and force to progress and important objectives. A child born on this day is possessed of exceptional force, determination and constructive ability, but a tendency to the subtle, crafty or underhand could weaken its support from influential places.
