

POST'S BRAN FLAKES
A LAXATIVE FOOD
Now you'll like Bran!
At All Grocers

OUT WEST
Have fifteen hundred acres, three miles from Calgary City limits, an ideal site for a fox ranch, close to one and a half miles, high, dry, sheltered, little timber, with splendid spring water. I will trade this for silver black pedregreed foxes.
If you have the stock, a fortune can be made here, splendid climate, good nights, abundance of cheap food, and an ever growing market.
Make advantage of excursion rates, now on, come out and see for yourself, it will pay you to give attention at once.
A. F. LANDELS,
19th Ave., West
Calgary, Alberta.
7-25wfm.

Farm for Sale at Mitchell River
My farm consisting of seventeen acres, thirteen clear and in good state of cultivation, balance covered with timber. Situated one and a half miles from Newport Churches, stores, school, Mills telephone within short radius. Farm fronting on Cardigan River. Eight roomed house finished complete with good cellar. Barn and outbuildings all in first class repair.
Never failing well in yard.
Any person desiring a home by the sea this is an ideal location. Reason for selling going to California, will sell with or without crop.
For further particulars apply to
MRS MURDOCK BOUCHARD
Mitchell River, Lot 54
King's County
2671-7-mwfm

Professional Cards
MacDonald & McPhee
B. A.
L. A. MacDonald H. F. McPhee
Barristers, Attorney, Etc.
Money to Loan
Riley Building, Charlottetown

AUCTION SALE
OF FARM AND STANDING HAY AT EAST ROYALTY
3 miles from town on Monday July 30th at 6 o'clock p. m. sharp. Farm of 24 acres choice, all under cultivation, well fenced and watered. 22 acres of hay will be sold with or without crop to suit purchasers. Sale positive. Terms at sale.
JOHN L. CONNOLLY,
City Auctioneer.
2927-7-26-41.

J. D. STEWART, K. C.
Barrister and Solicitor, 84 Great George Street
Solicitors for the Union Bank of Canada

Farm For Sale At St. Peters Road
Lot 53, Kings County consisting of Ninety two acres, 56 acres in high state of cultivation, forty newly covered with muschel mud, 36 covered with hard and soft wood, well watered, good dwelling house and out buildings near school. Will sell with crop or without. Possession can be given at once. Reason for selling ill health. Anyone wishing for a choice farm can communicate with Plus Mac Millan, R. R. 4, Cardigan. 2940-7-26-41.

Mark B. McGuigan
B. A.
BARRISTER, SOLICITOR, ETC.
Money to Loan
Cameron Block
Charlottetown, P. E. Island

Shore Farm For Sale
50 acres of land situated at Meadow Bank, all clear and in good state of cultivation. Buildings in good repair.
HERBERT HOWARD,
Meadow Bank
2807-7-21-61.

Economic Fox Feed
You can feed puppies at one cent per meal and keep them in fine condition by giving them Imperial Fox Biscuits. The only perfect food for foxes.
This Biscuit contains every needed food requirement and is the ideal puppy food when fed with milk. Sunshine and Cod Liver Oil give the best known preventative of rickets.
Imperial Fox Biscuits are a Ray of Sunshine to the busy rancher's busy hot days.
IMPERIAL BISCUIT CO., LTD
Box 446,
Charlottetown, P. E. I.
2702-7-17-41

INTERNATIONAL LINE EASTERN STEAMSHIP LINE, INC.
Resumption of Freight and Passenger Service Between ST. JOHN AND BOSTON
S. S. GOVERNOR DINGLEY will leave St. John every Wednesday at 5 p. m. (Atlantic Time) for Boston. Wednesday trips are via Eastport and Lubec, due Boston about 1 a. m. Thursday.
Saturday trips are to Boston direct, due Sundays about 2 p. m. RETURN—Leave Boston Mondays and Fridays at 10 a. m. (Daylight Saving Time) for Eastport, Lubec and St. John. STATEROOMS $3.00 FARE $16.00
At Boston connection is made via the Metropolitan Line express freight and passenger steamers for New York and points South and West.
For staterooms, rates and additional information, apply to
A. C. OUTIER, Agent, St. John, N. B.

S. S. "MANOA"
Passenger and Freight Steamer 8500 Tons Displacement
Leave Montreal for Ar. Charlottetown, Ar. Charlottetown
Charlottetown & leave for St. John's & leave for Montreal
Charlottetown

July 7	July 10	July 16
July 21	July 24	July 30
August 4	August 7	August 13
August 18	August 21	August 27
September 1	September 4	September 10
September 15	September 18	September 24

CARVELL BROS.
Agents

"THE LOVE PENDULUM"
BY MARION RUBINCAM

I HAVE A SHOCK
Chapter 37
The little man has an enormous head, starts too large for his thin, almost emaciated body. And the size of the head was increased by the bushy red hair that covered it, hair brushed sleekly into place, but that, by its very thickness, seemed to stand out all over the head.
He sat on a low stool, his rather long arms clasped around his knees. He was watching me, he had been watching for some time. I wanted him to come over and talk to me, but he never moved. Sometimes he turned to chat with an elderly man beside him.
The musician, a Mr. Nardonski, continued to be devoted to me.
"You are musical, of course?" he asked.
"Why the 'of course'?" I countered.
"He had a little way of lifting his shoulders now and then as he talked."
"You have temperament," he answered. "You have a sweet voice when speaking, so much sweeter than the voices of those one meets over here."
"I am no musician. One is always taught to play and sing a little."
"Then play a little for me, sing something to me."
I glanced around the room. He caught the look, guessed I did not want to before so many people, and suggested—
"The little music room will do."
Some of the people had left, the patrons of the orchestra had already gone. Gwen was standing by the door, saying goodbye. Win had moved to a big chair by the fireplace. The little man had disappeared.
Mr. Nardonski made some excuse about trying to play the music room, across the hall to the music room, a little room designed by one of our best artists. The walls had been painted with scenes from some strange dream forest, where fawns and curious animals played and where long vistas through the trees made the tiny room seem large as outdoors itself. In one corner the grand piano stood, around were some chairs and couches to lounge on, all the light was centered on the instrument, and then diffused to throw a pale illumination on the painted decorations.
"There is a room to play in, to create music, to feel its beauty."
Mr. Nardonski sat down, running his fingers over the keys of the piano. I saw some simple things, or him. He pretended he thought my voice very good. I took his compliments. I did not care what he thought. It was all part of my game. Then I played a Chopin prelude, a bit I remembered from a Tchaikovsky symphony, the "Love and Death" music from Tristan.
"Ah, there is passion there, in those slim white fingers!" he said, leaning nearer to me over the piano.
I said nothing. I kept my eyes on the keys. I was quite sure he was going to be sentimental and I wanted only enough interest to

Harvesters Needed In Western Canada
Excursions by Canadian National Railways Will be on August 3rd and 17th by Special Trains
FINISHED WITH DELORME
QUERBEC, July 28.—Sir Francis Delorme will not preside at the second Delorme trial. He made this definite announcement previous to his departure for his summer home in Carleton Place, Ontario, last evening.
"I have done my share in this case," he said, "and have helped the authorities as much as I could. This will terminate my connection with it. I will not accept the task again. Other judges will be called upon to deal with the case."
So sure was Abbe Adelaire Delorme of a verdict of acquittal being returned at his trial that it is stated arrangements had been completed by which he was to come to this city accompanied by Dr. D. Brochu, superintendent of St. Michel, and was to reside for some time at a private hospital near Quebec, to rest.

NOTICE
CHTOWN-PICTOU SERVICE
S. S. Magdalene is now making daily return trips between this port and Pictou, leaving Bruce Stewart & Co's Wharf at 7 a. m. leaving Pictou on return on the arrival of a limited number of autos can be handled each trip.
BRUCE STEWART & CO., LTD
AGENTS
Phone 828 or 778

Piles
are usually due to straining when constipated.
Nujol being a lubricant keeps the food waste soft and therefore prevents straining. Doctors prescribe Nujol because it not only soothes the suffering of piles but relieves the irritation, brings comfort and helps to remove them.
Nujol is a lubricant—not a medicine or laxative—so cannot gripe. Try it today.

Every 10c Packet of WILSON'S FLY PADS
WILL KILL MORE FLIES THAN $8.00 WORTH OF ANY STICKY-TRAP CATCHER

Clean to handle. Sold by all Druggists, Grocers and General Stores bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score.
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before the climax of the music, which was beyond my skill to do properly and began something of Scriabine's, transposing and changing and simplifying, since I had only heard the orchestral score."
"The theme de l'Extase," he cried. "Ah, but you are doing it very well indeed."
There was no music before me, only the polished ebony of the piano, which acted like a mirror. I could see the doorway behind me, I saw Gwendolyn enter and stand there, Gwendolyn beside her. The little man was with them. I pretended not to know, and put everything I had of skill and feeling into the music. I had never played as well.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," I heard Gwen murmur, in answer to a question from Win. "How beautifully she does it!"
They stood a moment, listening, while I played. Win had never heard me play. He knew little and cared nothing about music. He was listening eagerly now, so much I could tell from his attitude. Then I saw Gwen put her hand on his arm. At once his attention was diverted. He turned, and she turned, and they went out of the room together, his arm slipping through hers as they walked.
For an instant I felt sick, and my fingers stumbled. But Nardonski's hand kept me up. I played together all my courage and played as I never had before. I came to the long detoured, ecstatic climax of the music, and my fingers dropped from the keys.
"Let's go back," I said almost with the closing chord. The little man had slipped away.
I rose and walked toward the door before Nardonski could reach me.
"But you are wonderful," he cried, taking my hand to hold me back.
"Not wonderful, just a little tired," I answered. "I must go home now."
"And shall I not see you—again—alone perhaps and you will bring him to see me again. I did not want a scene here. I broke off before