LADY WILLINGTON'S GIFT TO RED CROSS

LONDON. — Lady Willington, whose husband has been Governor of Bombay and of Madras, Governor-General of Canada, and Viceroy and Governor-General of India, is now working again with the Red Cross Sales Committee.

She accompanied her husband during his economic mission to South America, from which they have only recently returned. Lady Willington has just presented to the Red Cross fund an ornament which she was given when she was in Peru.

It consists of a gold nugget set in a brooch. At first, the deep color of the gold led her to suppose that the nugget dated from the ancient civilization of the Incas.

In fact, however, it is of even greater historical interest, for it was the first nugget ever found in British Guiana.

As President Roosevelt denied that the U. S. navy and air patrol could be defined in terms of distances from the nation's shores, the scope of U. S. mile patrol is being extended ever further into the Atlantic. Map, above, shows how the 2000-mile patrol mentioned by Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, would take U. S. vessels to mid-Atlantic and to the shores of Ireland, if the 2000 miles is measured from our easternmost base in Newfoundland.

WHAT HAPPENED AT MONTALBAN

By PETER BENEDICT

ation. Now perhaps you'd like to talk to our housekeeper—and to the girl who's been looking after baby. It was purely a temporary arrangement—the girl leaves us to-morrow. Poor creature, she'll be glad to go. We are, as you must have noticed already, somewhat wearing to the nerves.

Cleone was leading the way along a half-lit caken corridor, and her smile, as she looked back over her shoulder into Molly's face, was bitter and wild. "Don't look shocked, Nurse. You must understand we've lived with this thing for three months, nearly, and we tired long ago of trying to dress it up and make it look respectable."

"Not shocked," said Molly, stung, "merely intrigued." For some reason the most normal people resent the supposition that they can be shocked, and Molly was no exception. "You've probably lost the flavour of it yourself, but to a mere onlooker it's rather piquant. However, you know, you'll be helping quite a lot if you'll leave it outside Mrs. Ralph's bedroom; it doesn't do her any good."

"I suppose not. Poor Barbara! I'm really rather sorry for her. Still, be content, Nurse. Now the point is I needn't go in to her at all. She won't mind, and I shall be delighted."

Somewhere in the vast back rooms of the house, in a small sitting-room attractively furnished, they found the housekeeper. She had piled grey hair, and a passionless face, and her voice when she spoke was slow and overweighted, so that the words ran singly with an exaggerated significance. "This woman could live through all manner of strange tragedies and not be moved; changes of staff no doubt there had been since the death of the girl Daunt, but no such slight incident could disturb the rest of Mrs. Forester."

She offered a hand as hard and unemotional as wood, and was glad to see Nurse Balcon, as it happened. Nurse Balcon would be comfortable. Her luggage had, of course, been taken up already to her room; and as she had set out early supper was being prepared for her.

The promised supper came on the instant, and was not unappreciated. Along with Mrs. Forester, she ate and listened.

"It might be convenient for you to have your meals here," said Mrs. Forester, "that is, if you have no objection. There's a sitting room just outside the door here that leads right on to the corridor where Mrs. Ralph's room is; and it's handy for the garden, too. If you go out by the side door—I'll show you in the morning—you come right into the sunniest corner of the orchard, where baby's pram usually goes on fine days. We're very quiet here; there's no one but myself and Mr. Severn."

"Mr. Severn is old Sir John's attendant—male nurse, if you like, though to be sure, don't think the old gentleman needs a nurse, exactly, even if he is nearly ninety. A very nice gentleman, Mr. Severn. She locked down her nose, and her tone was not at all one of liking.

"I trust Mr. Severn isn't nearing ninety, too," said Molly.

"Quite a young man, if you like, very much older than yourself, I should say. He's the old gentleman's constant companion."

"I'm a little fogged," confessed Molly, "about the family. I had it fixed in my mind that Sir John was the father of Mr. Ralph and the young ladies, but if he's that age, he's really cut."

"Sir John, the present baronet, is eighty-nine, and supposed to be childish. So far as the family are concerned, he might as well be dead. Mr. Montalban—his son Mr. Robert Montalban—has been as good as master here for twenty years. He's the father of the young people here."

"And have I met them all now? All but Charles, of course. I know he's abroad. Mrs. Montalban met us in the hall, and I've seen the two daughters, and of course Mr. Ralph and his wife. Is there anyone else?"

"There's the eldest son—Robert after his father. Mr. Robert is a cripple, she said, and he's been motoring accident seven years ago. He's very badly deformed, but quite active. He has a study and his bedroom right up on the second floor. Sometimes he stays there for days on end, when he has his bad times."

"They seem to be a peculiarly unlucky family," said Molly.

"Yes, indeed!" said Mrs. Forester, and for once had no more to say.

She was communicative enough, but only upon such subjects as the members of the household was sure to find out for herself in time. Nor was Molly disposed to ask her questions upon any other subject; one would not choose to share a curiosity with Mrs. Forester. Any one of a hundred openings could have led them straight into the heart of the Daunt tragedy, but Molly held her tongue.

Scout News and Notices

A recent war service job of Halifax Scouts was the pointing of "Don't Talk" posters in the restaurants, tea rooms, barber shops and theatre lobbies of the city.

Saskatoon Boy Scouts have been co-operating with the Canadian Legion in a house-to-house canvass of the homes of veterans of World War I for old "tin hats" for the use of civilian workers in England. A substantial quantity was secured. Publicity brought in a number from outside points by mail.

The cheerful courage and "sheer stinkability" shown while lying on his stomach, unable to move, for 170 days, because of burns on back, arms and legs, won the Scout Cornwell badge for 15 year old Scout Arthur Rossiter of London. An incendiary bomb on the factory where he worked caused the burns.

Boy Scouts of 163 Toronto Groups have by personal contribution and through entertainments and other means raised $1,500 for the district "Chin Up Fund" for brother Boy Scouts war sufferers in Britain. For the same purpose Oshawa Scouts raised nearly $300 and Huntsville Scouts $75 by special Scout Days.

The Vickers Boy Scouts Band of Montreal, for many years one of the Dominion's outstanding boys' bands and winners of many musical competitions is now the band of the Montreal Division of the R. C. N. V. R. for the duration. The band volunteered as a practical form of national service, and the Montreal Boy Scouts Association promptly granted the necessary permission for the use of the band instruments. The band recently gave a largely attended concert, assisted by the Montreal Male Choir, in the ballroom of the Windsor Hotel. The band is under the leadership of Bandmaster Leslie Blackburn, one of its original members when first organized in 1920. The boys are the sons of employees of the Vickers plant.

Regardless of the blizz, the Scouts of Glasgow recently opened a new headquarters.

The Boy Scout movement was officially banned in Holland by the Nazi invaders in April. A statement from Amsterdam by way of Berlin alleged that the Dutch Scouts, as members of an international Scout movement were "an instrument of British cultural and political propaganda."

The painting of some sixty carefully chosen trees in a cemetery was a beautification project carried out by the Boy Scouts of Langley, B. C. Commending the enterprise.

The Langley Advance added: "We feel that the selection made should prove very beautiful at different time of the year, there being dogwood, beautiful in bloom and in autumn colors; birches, graceful in winter and summer alike, and the beautiful red oak. There is also an English chestnut, a Scotch rowan tree and a few laburnums."

Toronto's 1st Boy Scout War service Group, a composite unit of older boys of down-town area Scout troops, many of them of foreign parentage, proved the usefulness of their training for the Scout Fireman's badge when a fire occurred in the business section near their headquarters at St. James Parish House. They formed a line to keep back the large crowd that gathered, and assisted the firemen in hauling hose and handling ladders. As a final good turn they procured pails and ladled out drinking water to the parched fire fighters. The boys were highly commended by Fire Chief Sinclair.
