MONDAY, AUGUST 6, 1900.

THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA.

Long before the war between the United States and Spain the people of Cuba had been fighting for their liberties. The result of that war was to break the bonds of Spanish oppression, but left Cuba under the military government of the United States. This was not the aim and object of the Cuban patriots, though the change of rulers has been a beneficial one. The country has been pacified, industry restored, property protected, and ordered liberty has taken the place of anarchy and oppression. But, while on the one hand it has been hoped in the United States that the people of Cuba would desire to accept the place and privilege of a state in the great American Union, they have not shown a disposition to do so. In fact they have become a little restless under military government too long continued.

It has been felt on both sides that the time has come for a change. The United States War Department which has since the war administered the Government of Cuba, has now called upon the people of the Island to elect delegates to frame a free constitution for their country. So in the not distant future Cuba will be really independent, and the idea of annexation is postponed indefinitely. It may revive hereafter, or it may not. The Chicago Tribune, a principal organ of the McKinley Government in the West, now frankly makes the following admissions:

Undoubtedly nearly all the Cubans wish to have a government of their own. They long to be citizens of the Republic of Cuba. The desire for annexation to the United States, which some Americans assumed would manifest itself speedily, seems to be non-existent. On his arrival from Cuba last week, General James H. Wilson, who was on duty there for some time, said: "The thinking people of Cuba unquestionably desire the emancipation of the island as soon as it possibly can be accomplished." General Wilson said also, "The administration could make no happier move, so far as the Cubans are concerned, than to hand the government of their country over to them."

After a constitution has been framed it will be submitted to popular vote. Then a president and Congress will be elected under the new order of things and the United States authority will give place to them. Then the new Spanish-American Republic will have to make its own way. We are of opinion that it would be better for Cuba and the Cubans to accept the position of a state in the American union, but this is against their national aspirations. It is, on the other hand gratifying to find that the Washington Government is keeping faith with them and leaving the Cuban people free to shape their own future in their own way.

MOTIVES OF REGICIDES.

Within a few days past the King of Italy has been murdered and the Shah of Persia narrowly escaped a like fate, the crimes in both cases being the work of Anarchists. Bressi, who killed King Humbert, had been five years in the United States, where he had a home, a wife and child to whom he was attached, and remunerative employment. Why should the fact that there are monarchs in the Old World have had a disturbing effect upon his mind? And yet this man left apparently all that men hold dear, and crossed the broad ocean to kill the King of Italy. We know little of the would-be assassin of the Shah, but he too was an Anarchist.

What is the secret of this mysterious organization, with such power over its membership, whose mission in the world is the slaying of kings and rulers? Doubtless some Anarchists are lunatics, but surely all of them are not so. And yet the Anarchistic virus once it infects a

SOME MONARCH'S SALARIES

Queen Victoria the Worst Paid of all Mikado the best Paid.

Of all the great monarchs of the world Queen Victoria and the Mikado of Japan are the most popular with their subjects. Queen Victoria is the worst paid and the Mikado the best. The budget of England is $500,000,000 a year, while that of Japan is $113,000,000. Japan, with a surplus of $18,000,000, allows her Emperor $10,000,000 a year and readily gives him an extra million when he wants it. England, with a surplus, refuses to increase the allowance of the Prince of Wales. He has an allowance of $200,000 a year. The Queen gets only $1,000,000—$9,000,000 less than the Mikado.

THE KAISER WANTS A RAISE.

Whenever he thinks of the Mikado Emperor William must be miserable. Germany has no deficit, and the Emperor wants a little appropriation to make improvements on his property, but it is questionable if he will get it. He has concluded that Potsdam is unhealthy on account of the marshy ground which surrounds it. Two or three hundred thousand dollars will make it high and dry. The Radical members of the Reichstag suggest an easy way out of the difficulty. He need only put one of his 50 castles up at auction and some rich Berliner will gladly bid it in.

But the Emperor would no more part with one of his castles than with the divine right of being photographed at least once a week. This proposition might have been practicable under one of the old Prussian Kings, but it is not now, his Majesty thinks. William runs about the country so much that he has managed since he became Emperor to spend a night in every one of his palaces. Probably he would no sooner have sold a palace in a distant part of his realm than for some reason or other he would have to go there to unveil a statue to one of his new-to-be-for-gotten ancestors, and the poor man would have no place to sleep.

ANOTHER WILLIAM THRIVED THERE.

The great William traveled little. He lived to be more than fourscore, despite the marshy surroundings of Potsdam. His people were content with him, and he was content to sit every day in that memorable room in the old Schloss, and while he watched the troops defile out of the barracks the crowd silently passed the window, looking up to him with reverence and respect. He did not have any vestibule train always ready to fly at his pleasure. He lived under his income. William lives in excess of it, in contradistinction to his economical grandmother, Victoria, whom he so heartily dislikes. He has an allowance of about $3,750,000 a year, besides a great deal of revenue from various properties and perquisites. He finds it such hard work to get along on this that if the time ever comes when the Reichstag is in a good humor he will ask for a million more. The Reichstag is certainly not in a good humor at present, when he is asking it for the improvement of Potsdam at the same time that he is refusing to pay the expenses of his Palestine journey and blandly turns the bill over to his legislators.

The Reichstag is certainly not in a good humor at present, when he is asking it for the improvement of Potsdam at the same time that he is refusing to pay the expenses of his Palestine journey and blandly turns the bill over to his legislators.

The palaces at Potsdam are supposed to be the summer residence of the Emperor and the palaces in Berlin his winter residence. Old William had rather a preference for Berlin. Young William is fond of Potsdam. In the days of Frederick the Great the journey from Berlin to Potsdam, when the roads were bad, was an arduous bit of travel. Now it is a question of only a few minutes on the Emperor's train. William is fond of outdoors, fond of being with his children, fond of taking their discipline into his own hands and boxing their ears when necessary, and he believes that the country is the best place for the young princes. His own withered farm makes him feel keenly the importance of physical vigor, and he has determined that his offspring shall have this first of all.

MULTIPLICATION OF PALACES.

Potsdam is a quaint little town, the German counterpart of Windsor, where Queen Victoria spends most of her time. Frederick the Great built Sans-Souci in 1745. Here he spent most of his time, and here he died. In his music room the visitor may see the old spinet on which he used to play. On the tortoise-shell music stand near at hand is a piece of music of his own composition set for the flute. The new palace, barely a mile away, was built by Frederick after the Seven Years' War, and it cost $3,750,000. When Frederick William II came to the throne he had to build still another palace, called the marble Palace. The fourth palace at Potsdam is the chateau of Babelsburg. This was the favorite summer home of the old William. Young William himself has laid out the plans with his customary originality and energy as to the work which needs to be done to insure that his sons and daughter shall be healthy.

Though William has a much larger income than his grandmother, his income is smaller and his castles are fewer than those of Franz Josef of Austria who has an allowance of $4,500,000 a year. But Franz Josef has not managed to save anything, nor has King Humbert of Italy, who has $3,000,000 a year.

A CONTENTED KING.

Humbert is the only King in Europe who thinks that his income is large enough. He told his Parliament that no extra allowance on account of the marriage of the crown prince was necessary. He would see that the princess and any children that might arrive would arrive allowance.

The Italian deputies were not taken by surprise. They are accustomed to such generosity on the part of their King. Year after year he has turned over great sums to the state to make the heavy burden of taxation on his people a little less oppressive.
