THE LOVE PENDULUM

GOING MY WAY Chapter. 62

"No, I won't run away," I told my aunt. "After all, I've decided on this thing and I'll see it through. I hate the idea of talk, but it can't be helped."

"In that you show more sense than I expected," my aunt surprised me by saying. "However, as I said, we'll manage to send Winthrop back to Wellsville where he came from and where he belongs, and that will save you the embarrassment of running into him. It's a large city, but one is always stumbling over undesirable characters."

In spite of my sense of dejection, I laughed a little at the casual way in which she disposed of poor Win. "Let's see," she went on, narrowing her eyes a trifle as she always did when she was thinking hard. "Gwen will try to keep him here. She has a great deal of influence with Waterman. But then I can bring influence on Waterman through the George Smiths, who financed him when he started business. Yes, that will do. They'll buy out Win and we'll send him back."

"But that wouldn't be fair," I objected. "After all, Win loves it here. He's made good in the business, and it would not be nice to get him away." I well knew she could if she wanted, for my aunt had enormous social influence and could if she chose make things so unpleasant for Win, without his knowing what she was doing, that she would practically drive him out of town.

"It does not matter to me whether he likes it here or not," she said calmly. "He never belonged here. He only came because you brought him and introduced him. Naturally, anyone who marries a Bennett would be accepted anywhere."

"I said nothing to this. My aunt's family pride was her strongest characteristic."

"We'll leave for Montreal tomorrow on the 7.45," she said as though that closed the whole discussion. "No," I answered decidedly. "I won't. I'm here and I'll stay. I won't run away from any unpleasant talk. As for getting Win out of town, I'd feel very badly if you did. And I doubt whether you could, because as you say, Gwen will fight to keep him here."

"Oh, I can manage her," my aunt said easily. "One can always count on Gwen's perversity as her greatest weakness. She's very fascinating and personally I admire her a great deal. But she is doing with Winthrop what she did with some-

Executed For Burning Coal As a Fuel. BETHLEHEM, Pa., Aug. 27.—If your coal bin is empty Jan. 1, 1924, it may comfort you to know that in 1306 King Edward I. of England, issued a proclamation making the use of coal as fuel in London a capital offense. One case is on record where an accused was tried found guilty of burning coal condemned and promptly executed. Professor V. S. Babasianin professor of organic chemistry at Lehigh University, who is just completing extensive research work on coal tar derivatives, recounts several amusing incidents. The invisible gaseous products of the combustion of coal were early pronounced detrimental to health and vegetation. Resentment became intense when ladies of rank their fair faces made fairer by liberal applications of powder underwent a curious change of complexion whenever they sat near a coal fire. Five centuries later chemists might have explained that face powders made from lead compounds were quite likely to turn black in the sulphurous atmosphere of gas from burning coal. The nature of the smoke and odor from burning coal remained a mystery until after the middle of the seventeenth century when an alchemist devised an ingenious process of heating coal in the absence of air. The liquid obtained was known as "oil of coal" and was sold as a most potent remedy for many ailments. Then followed the isolation of large quantities of the highly inflammable gas, spirit of coal. In 1810, the first gas light and coke company organized, and after 10 years of effort the residents of London and Paris were induced to see the advantages of this new method of illumination. When coal is distilled for illuminating gas it yields an enormous quantity of black sticky by-product now known as coal tar. Early in the nineteenth century this tar had been proposed as axle grease for wheel-roping fabrics for roofing and for the preservation of timber. But after all the available water-proofed, roofs covered and timber preservative, coal tar continued to accumulate, killing vegetation polluting the air, and raising a storm of protest. The answer came from the refinery at Trafalgar Square becomes Fleet Street in less than a mile and ends half a mile further on at St. Paul's Cathedral as Langate Hill. The heaviest part of London's traffic goes along it or crosses it. Limousines, Fords, motor trucks, horse-drawn drays carriages handcarts and bicycles race each other along the fifty-yard stretches between stops. It takes from 10 to 25 minutes to go the length of the Strand by taxicab, motorcar or bus. It takes 12 or 15 minutes to walk it. Parliamentary committees are meeting, traffic policemen are sweating and those in the traffic are cursing in their efforts to solve the problem. It there is any solution it will come probably from the deliberations of the parliamentary committees. But there may not be any solution. English people hate too much legislation; and an effort to rule bicycles, push-carts or drays of the busy streets would meet with opposition. And the narrow winding streets are still here. Occasionally the leases covering one section of a street expire and that part is made wider. It still winds and leases do not expire in bunches every year. Anyway London will have to find something else to advertise for a time.

London Traffic Is Jolted By Soldiers' Buses

LONDON, Aug. 27.—Just when London started advertising its street traffic was faster than New York's, the traffic system-blew up. Vehicles during the rush hour are less than three miles an hour. A small bus was started to form-erly the public utilities service were highly organized. The subways and buses for over 7,000,000 people were under one management along with about half of the comparatively few street cars. Some ambitious young ex-soldiers bought a bus and began running it in opposition to the thousands operated by the big company. Their nerve appeared to Londoners and it was full for as many hours a day as its crew could keep it going. That caused the trouble. Within a month there were half a dozen new bus companies, and now there are half a hundred, operating anywhere from one to twenty or thirty buses each—along main streets. They have left the old company to do the dirty work in the quiet sections and the suburbs. And the old company is trying to smother them with hundreds of additional buses of its own.

The result is chaos. There are no Fifth avenues. London's street system is weird. The arteries have developed, through the last twenty centuries from cow-paths to main streets. They are narrow, tricky and tortuous. They wind along indolently into other streets and begin and end nowhere.

The Strand comes out of nothing one else in London, so she won't be received there any more by nice people. "I fancy I looked a little surprised, for she went on: "They're harmless enough affairs, all of them. Gwen simply has no judgment about when to stop. Some people in London disapproved of a few of her friends and to show them she didn't care she went about with those people until everyone that amounted to anything dropped her. She didn't like them, she was simply stubborn. She did it in Rome in another way to the horror of a very strict set there. She'll ruin herself in New York by running about with Win now."

"But I don't want to ruin her," "Well, if she has no sense about the way she manages her affairs, I don't see that you should supply the sense for her." My aunt rose, pulling all her furs around her and making a very magnificent appearance indeed, in my tiny apartment. "Are you coming home with me?" she asked. "I shook my head. "No, I'll stay here, I'd rather please."

And with that she left. My father came in in the evening and was rather sympathetic, but inclined to side with Win. He also wanted to take me with him, but I refused that offer too. And the next day came a brief note from Win. "You might have left some word for me," he began. "I did not know you meant to leave that night. I got in late and went to bed, thinking of course, you were in your room. And in the morning I supposed you asleep. It was not until afternoon when I came back that Ellen told me you had taken your trunk and gave me your address. It puts me in an awkward position with people, having my wife go off like this, but I suppose I'll have to stand it. I suppose, too, it's better for each of us to go our separate ways. I'll send you a check every month."

And that was all. A check was enclosed. I put this in another envelope, addressed it to him and sent it back without a word. For what was there to say? He had accepted my going—his only concern was the talk as it would affect him. I told father I would take half the allowance I used to have. I did not want Win's money. In time I hoped to make myself independent. That evening I went to the theatre with Senla, and a friend of hers. Both girls were working, both were earnest and sincere, both liked me. One girl was trying to make a living by illustrating, the other by writing.

They were plain, unaffected, interested in everything going on in the world, not afraid to be poor, not afraid to acknowledge it. We bought seats at the top of the house, and I never so enjoyed a play in my life. I was going my own way at last, to the horror of my own future peace of mind. Meantime it was desperately lonely, but I had to grow used to that.
