Longer Life
For Fence Posts

Preservative treatment to prevent decay and prolong the life of non-durable fence posts is recommended by the Forest Products Laboratories, Department of Mines and Resources, Ottawa. The length of life of fence posts depends mainly on the species and the conditions of service. For example, cedar is naturally durable and will last for many years, but most of the common woods are not durable and in contact with the soil soon decay. Investigations show that many years of service can be added to certain species by simple and in expensive treatment. Creosote oil is the best effective preservative and will increase the service life of non-durable posts twenty years or more. Posts may be treated (either full length or only butts) with creosote oil by heating the air seasoned posts in hot oil and then submerging them in cold oil. This treatment is known as the "hot and cold tank" treatment. A cheaper, less efficient treatment consists of dipping posts in hot oil. Where a tank is not available, two brushings with hot creosote, well brushed in, will add two or three years to the life of the posts. Twelve to thirteen years of service life may be given air seasoned non-durable species by treating the posts with a 3-5 per cent solution of a preservative salt (zinc chloride, sodium fluoride and copper sulphate) by the "hot and cold tank" treatment. This treatment is generally more effective than steeping the posts for several days in a salt solution. Freshly-cut posts may be treated by standing the butts of the green posts in a salt solution for a week or more.

GUINEA FIGS

Sometimes ago I read a book about human Guineas which impressed me much. It impressed me because it made me realize that I, too, am a Guinea Pig. And, challenge anyone to dress and feed a Guinea Pig in this scientific and commercial age is neither a healthy business nor a sane one.

Little of our body, this book tells us, escapes the Great Experiment. It begins at our old gray head and marches down either through the oral cavity or over a "skin you love to touch" all the way to the end of the tail. (Indeed we are to be much concerned about our "Foot and Mouth" disease.)

Everywhere we are conscious of a thousand symptoms, blemishes and personal defects through insidious words verily and these are their remedies. It proceeds with the hair dye, the antiseptic, the tooth-paste, the soap, the ointment, the bran, the yeast, the vitamin "D" and the what-not to extract our dollars and to cure our maladies.

Good! But, the book continues, if we color our locks, we may die from lead poisoning; if we buy the expensive tooth-paste, we may remove the enamel as well as the film from our teeth; the antiseptic we use often kills the influenza germ nor cures the halitosis; the guaranteed Freckle Remover may leave spots bigger and browner than any freckles.

The case is no better when this book examines what we swallow: the rosy apple, the green pear, the residue of arsenic; the dried fruit with sulphur dioxide gas; bottled syrups sometimes contain harmful preservatives and unwholesome injurious chemicals. It finds that the picture of a bearded, French Scientist peering through a microscope, an index to the quality of our foods or to the safety of our medicines.

Moreover, should we by sneezing, eating and swallowing so upset the organs and body functions as to hasten the onset of disease and death,—well, it is just too bad for the Guinea Pigs! Our Food and Medicine Lawmakers bother little about it.

Truly we are bewildered. Commercial gain is advertised for commercial gain. We know not the safe from the unsafe, the valuable from the valueless. In the words of the poet:

"Our life is like a narrow raft
Afloat upon a narrow sea.
Hereon is but a little space,
And all men eager for a place
Do thrust each other in the sea.
And so our life is wan with fears,
And so the sea is salt with tears.
Ah, well is that! 'Tis not art asleep,
The last line ironically brings home to us the thread running all through the book.

Yes, this book about human Guinea Pigs impressed me because I am a Guinea Pig—and did not know it! Because it makes startling assertions about the things we use everyday; because it exposes the commercial exploitation of health and happiness; because it reveals that we are taking money from a second-hand pocket for patent medicine cures, that we are taking money from a third pocket to pay a doctor to relieve us of our cures; and, finally, because it reveals the apathy of governments and officials who already know of and permit that which the book diagnoses.

Second Chance

The mill became my favourite harbour—the word is used deliberately. Usually the place was deserted, or, at the most, there were a few anglers there. A gentle melancholy brooded over the spot; once the scene of considerable human activity and the repository of human hopes, it had passed out of the world where people are judged by results.

He spoke of it to Mrs. Gaddesden.

"Yes, I know it," she said. "My husband used to fish there years ago. 'Tis still got his old rod and tackle. Not that he ever caught anything but he always said that there were big fish in the pond."

"You're welcome to use my husband's."

During the week he went over the rod and tackle of the departed Gaddesden and with a little adjustment it proved to be still usable. On the following Saturday he set out immediately after the midday meal.

The Mill was silent; he was completely alone there. It is a curious fact that one is never so consciously alone in such a place as one often is in the midst of a great crowd. Slowly and methodically he set the rod together and began his attack on the fish, if any, in the pool above the weir.

SOMEONE TO TEA.

Once, he might have a bite; the float moved and the bait had disappeared. But beyond that, the final result of the afternoon's fishing was nil, unless one counts the sedative effect of the quiet hours by the gently moving water.

He had brought some tea with him in a vacuum flask and was thinking about it when a girl, wheeling a bicycle, came along the path and over the little bridge.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Ferguson," Mary Donovan said with a pleasant smile.

"Oh, good afternoon!" he said.

"Any luck?"

"Not in the way of fish, I'm afraid. But it's a lovely spot."

She was standing on the path still holding her bicycle.

"I was just about to have a cup of tea. Will you join me?" he suggested.

"Have you enough for two?" she asked.

"Whatever there is, we'll share," he said.

"I had some," she said. "I had Gaddesden, she's put up sufficient for at least two."

"I've some chocolate we can make up with against as she leaped her bicycle against a gate.

He fixed his rod on an iron upright, knowing that it had almost no chance of getting a fish on its own as with a fish on a salt solution. Freshly-cut posts may be treated by standing the butts of the green posts in a salt solution for a week or more.

When I saw that it was you, I almost turned back."

"Whatever for? Am I so terrible?" he asked.

"No. But I have a feeling that you like being alone and that it's rather an impertinence to intrude."

"Not at all. Really, I'm a very sociable animal," he said with a smile. "And I've no friends in Mossford at all."

"Then I'm glad I didn't turn back. Most of the men in the office will be at the football match; it's the last of the season. But you aren't interested?"

"No, I'm not."

"Nor am I. But Mossford takes football very seriously."

"And you don't, I gather?"

"No."

"What do you take seriously? What do you consider important?" he asked.

"That's a very difficult question to be faced with suddenly," she smiled. "My job, I suppose—within reason. And the happiness of the people I'm fond of—my mother, for example. And, I suppose, seeing that I get as much out of life as I can."

He nodded as if he agreed.

"And now you tell me what you take seriously," she went on.

"I wonder. At one time it was Success. Now . . . I don't know."

"Happiness," she suggested.

"People seem to fight for success—as you call it—and when they've got it they don't think a great deal of it."

Again he nodded. "Life is like that, I'm afraid. Not," he went on, "I have experienced this thing we call Success."

"You're setting down with us at Therover's?"

"I hope so. I'm beginning to feel quite at home there. I find the week-ends rather lonely though."

"Do you often come to the Mill?" he asked as she poured out a cup of tea for her.

"No. But I heard someone talking about it last week and decided to go. I recognised you as I came down the path from the road."

"It's a very happy meeting."

"I wonder if it is, Mrs. Gaddesden."

your home?" she asked, after a silence.

"I hope to," he replied.

"You'll probably find us more reticent than Londoners," she said and added with a smile, "Not that I'm particularly reticent. I'm afraid."

"You've been exceedingly kind to me, Miss Donovan," he said. "I do appreciate it."

"Nonsense," she smiled.

"It meant a great deal to me," he insisted. "That Saturday night at your aunt's . . . I wanted a friendly word."

"To Be Continued."

After Pneumonia Couldn't Get Strong

After many illnesses the patient is often left in an extremely weak and exhausted condition. To all those convalescents needing a tonic to strengthen and build up their weakened system we would recommend Milburn's Health and Nerve Pills to assist them to recover the full enjoyment of robust health. They help to tone up the nervous system and bring back bodily strength and vigor.

Buy a box and be convinced. Mrs. GEORGE CLARK, Wallace, N.S., writes:—"Some time ago I had a severe attack of pneumonia. I never seemed to get my strength back, and was always in a weak, nervous condition until a friend advised me to take Milburn's Health and Nerve Pills.

After I had taken two boxes I felt as well as ever, so I will recommend them to any one who is suffering as I did, for I could not have taken any medicine that would have done me so much good."
