ST. JOHN RECEIVES LARGE MAIL

ST. JOHN, N. B. Dec. 20.—The Local Post Office Staff are experiencing the heaviest mail in the history of the office. The Victorian which docked here yesterday brought 11 cars of Xmas mail from the British Isles and the Carquet which arrived the same day brought the largest mail ever received from the West Indies. Heavy mails from the States and boat from France and South Africa have added to the work.

Mrs. R. C. McRae of Sydney has arrived in the city to spend Christmas.

THE WOMAN HE MARRIED

BY JANE PHELPS

NAN URGES DICK TO TAKE A CHANCE

Chapter 39 ....

Being the possessor of that gown made me more anxious than ever that Dick should make extra money. In spite of his caution, I had talked often with Clara about speculating and had begun to study the cotton reports.

Dick caught me one morning, and he explained a lot to me that seemed very complicated, but which he appeared to think simple. I was delighted that he talked with me on the subject. I cherished the thought that perhaps it was a good omen, a sign that he had decided to take a chance. That was the way I thought of it—taking a chance, yet I gave no thought to the fact that he might lose.

"I think Mr. Bruns is awfully nice to tip you off," I said to Dick. He went off into perfect peals of laughter.

"Tip me off!" he repeated, "You have the jargon of the street a bit mixed, Nan."

"But don't you see, when a big man like that tells you things you run no risk at all? Why, it would be like finding money!" I said in reply to remark Dick made.

"Even men like Bruns come a cropper occasionally, and, it might be just that time I would get frisky and try my luck. But what's the us of talking about it, dear? You are all excited and your cheeks are fairly crimson. I've no money to take chances with, even if I abso lutely knew I would win."

"How much do you have to have?"

"It depends upon how much one buys or sells."

"But for a small lot to commence?"

"Oh, I would have to have at least $500 to trade at all. Do stop talking about it, Nan dear."

"Why don't you borrow that much?"

"Borrow it—of whom?"

"Wouldn't your sister let you have it? Or Mr. Stowell?" I had never before given the Stowells a thought when considering the question of Dick's making more money. Now, I wondered why. They were so rich—and so very friendly.

"No, Nan, I never shall ask my sister for money. As for asking Stowell, that's foolish. Why should he lend me money—perhaps that I never could return?"

"If you told him what Mr. Burns told you, wouldn't that make him want you to have it—repay him I mean? Not just that either. Make it an object for him, is more what I mean."

"What a little Eve you are Nan!" Then, "It's no use, dear I won't run in debt to speculate." He resumed his reading, but I felt encouraged. He had not spoken as firmly as was his custom. He had not been impatient or harsh with me for urging him. I said no more, but sat quietly sewing while he read. Finally he threw his paper on the table, and exclaimed:

"Darn it all, Nan! I wish you wouldn't put ideas into my head. You make me mighty uncomfortable."

"That's because you feel guilty at not doing all you can to make money."

"If the firm found out I was speculating I might lose my job."

"Nonsense! You never agreed not to did you?"

"No, but we aren't supposed to—the employees of any Wall Street firm aren't."

"Do you have to run and tell them?"

"Oh, do stop, Nan! I want to make you happy, dear," in a milder tone, "but somehow I feel that even if we had a little money to take a chance with, it would do us no good."

"I certainly know it would. And Dick, I am sure Mr. Stowell would lend you $500 or a $1,000"—my ideas growing. "Even rich men like to make more money sometimes, don't they? And if you tell him the tips you get, he can try for himself."

"Well—I'll think about it. But drop it for tonight, dear. And—I'd try it to please you, if for no other reason, if we had saved the money. But to borrow, perhaps lose, then have that to pay, frightens me."

"Don't be a coward, Dick!"

He flushed angrily, but made no reply. I, too, dropped the subject satisfied with the progress I had made.

Tomorrow—Nan Confesses About the Dress.

Hints for the Motorist

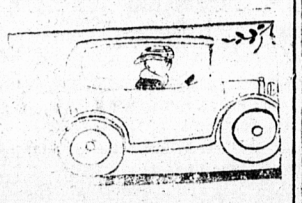
BY ALBERT L. CLOUGH

ANOTHER KNOCKING ENGINE

E. A. W. writes:—My engine pounds when the car is going up a hill or running fast, but this is not due to lack of oil, as I look after this closely. What do you think the knock or pound is caused by?

Answer: — Most probably by looseness in the crankshaft bearings, which you should have inspected at once and readjusted, if necessary. Carbon deposits on the piston heads will cause a clear hollow knock, especially when the throttle is opened widely or suddenly, which can be stopped by scraping of the carbon. Looseness of the engine on the frame or looseness of the flywheel, will cause a heavy pounding. Loose connection-rod bearings, worn pistons and worn wrist-pins cause light knocks. Of course, if the spark is too much advanced, on hills, the engine pounds. There are many other things that cause these noises, but it is probable that you will find your bearings need taking up or that carbon removal is necessary.

CAUSE OF SMOKY EXHAUST



C. S. J. wrties: — Although my night engine has lots of pep and power, its exhaust is very smoky. Even after it is warmed up, it still smokes. New rings have recently been installed. Do you suppose that I need new pistons and inner sleeves?

Answer:—The ring at the top of each piston is largely dependent upon to keep oil out of the combustion space and prevent smoking and, if, these rings were badly fitted or have not yet worn in fully this may account for your trouble. We believe that this engine has its oil supply control interconnected with the throttle and, if this connection was not put together and adjusted correctly, you may be getting too much splash and therefore considerable smoke. We assume that you are using the best grade of oil adapted to this engine the pistons and sleeves in this type of engine have a very long life and we should be rather surprised if you found them worn enough to require renewal.
