Ashford when he gave the address of welcome at the official social reception on Wednesday night. The chairman of the reception committee was Mr. E. Clawson, and associated with him were Messrs. C. H. Black and Gordon Avar. The members of the Session and their wives were "At Home" to the new members. The evening passed with a lively programme of games and fellowship and was climaxed with a beautiful array of food, supplied by the wives of the members of Session. Hon. A. W. Matheson was the Master of Ceremonies, and in his own facile way kept the event rolling happily for all. All the presidents of various departments of the church were invited to mention the work brought to a close when Mrs. Ashford was asked to go to the piano and play Auld Lang Syne.

Lonely Parade By Fannie Hurs

There are few, if any, personal or personal reasons which made Stafford Pretorius important in the various lists which Kitty kept in a carefully edited form in a small morocco-bound book, which closed with a lock and key.

At twenty-three, pallid, with thinning hair and growing bulk, he was already the victim of a nervous affliction which caused him to blink his eyes in rapid spasms. This, as it became known, was the result of a disease which had been contracted by him while working in a small firm of Wall Street brokers who, taking him in on the strength of his connections, were to learn later how remote his contacts with that branch of the Pretorius family which for generations had maintained a position of wealth and power in city and state. As a matter of fact, financial reverses were already vitiating even the major branches of the family.

Ignatius Mable, philanthropist and donor of library buildings, with his name cut deeply into their marble porticos, was cousin, twice removed, to Stafford's father, who had risked his all and sunk his all in Klondike gold. But that too proved to be an uninteresting and unindulgent connection which led nowhere.

There was one asset, however, which in Kitty's opinion made him valuable to her. Stafford was the godson of Elsie (Mrs. Tommy Tweed) Pretorius. If your goals were the kind of places where unswervingly directly, the dowager member of a family whose social and financial prestige went deeply into the railroad history of the country became a red pin upon the map of intention and purpose.

It is true that Elsie Pretorius thought little, if anything, of this remote god-son of hers who was the youngest child of an impetuous third cousin and whose coloring, she once declared, reminded her of the white of an egg surrounded by yolk-yellow hair. Along with large contingents of other outpost relations, Stafford attended the famous Christmas annuals of his dowager godmother, when two hundred guests sat themselves at table in the baronial dining hall of her town house.

It took Kitty exactly two days, after meeting Stafford, to learn quite accidentally by way of him that his godmother was fond of hand-wrought jewelry, the vocational art she had acquired at night classes, and another week possess to enable him to forgive and continue to live with his wife after she has confessed that she has been untrue to him in three instances and where the three men, who are her partners in guilt, are living in the same town? Isn't this the hardest thing that any man was ever called upon to do?

ANSWER: Yes. And it is an added turn of the knife for him to have to meet daily the men with whom she has betrayed him. As to the qualities that it takes to forgive an unfaithful wife they must be, I think, an almost divine pity for her weakness, and an understanding of a nature that is perhaps constitutionally emotionally unstable.
DOBOTHY DIX cannot reply personally to readers, but will answer problems of general interest through her column.

to accomplish, by way of him, an invitation to tea at the town house of Elsie Pretorius.
Somewhat agast at thus being prodded into an aggressiveness uncharacteristic of him, Stafford wrote his godmother a note which surprised her with a quality she had never before noted in her undistinguished godson. What had actually happened was that, unable to find a way out under the pressure of this extraordinary Kitty Mullane who had suddenly fastened her glittering interest upon his godmother, Stafford had written the note with flavor of Kitty's talk clinging to his mind and pen. Dear Godmother.
I have met a lady who is sufficiently interesting to warrant my asking you to invite us to tea. As you know, being your godson is my great social and everything-else asset. No, the situation is not what you might think. She is considerably older than I, and we do not interest each other that way. Among her many interests are jewelry and costume designing. May I bring her to one of your Fridays or any other day you may designate? Her name is Kitty Mullane. She is one of three very interesting women who have established themselves together. You may have heard of two of them. That heavy-set Miss Charlotte Ames (yes, the right Ames) who looks like a cross between a Tammany alderman, a baby elephant, and a Buddha, and is about the most original woman in town. And then, John Baldwin's daughter Sierra, quite a saint, or at least she looks like one, and who had that crazy mother who wore red plush and diamonds to breakfast after John Baldwin began to show up ore in the pan. To me the most interesting member, by all odds, of this queer assortment is this Kitty Mullane. She's a real new person, although she says of herself that she had no background and is all front. She thinks you are topping and is crazy to meet you. Your godson awaits permission to bring her to you.
Later, when the two had met and were calling each other by their first names, Elsie confided to Kitty that this was the first letter she had ever received from her godson. "That, more than his word picture of you three charming witches, was what moved me to tell my young parasite bore to trot you along that foul Thursday afternoon I was laid up with bronchitis."
Foul was the word. It was the last kind of day Kitty, who had feline antipathy for damp, would have chosen for this excursion into the awareness of this important dowager. Sensitive to atmospheric pressure, her mood rising or drooping with it, she drove to the hour of her appointment, shivering alongside Stafford in their handsome cab.
"Your godmother is sure to hate me today. I bought this darling blue velvet bird's nest of a hat just for the occasion, but now in this dirty weather I look like a hag and feel like two. Kitty just hates feeling damp."
