300 CLAIM OLD FORTUNE
Three hundred descendants of Robert Hobbs, an Australian pioneer, are claiming their share of the fortune which he left 101 years ago. The claims were inspired by the finding recently of Hobbs' will in the office of an old firm of attorneys in Sydney, N. S. W. According to records Hobbs, a member of a wealthy silk weaving family, was sent to Botany Bay for a minor offense about 1790. On gaining freedom he obtained a grant of 60 acres of land in the Windsor district of New South Wales. He died in 1830 and left the will which has been found. The principal difficulty in the way of proving it was the fact that it is only signed with a mark. Hobbs' hand being so crippled with rheumatism that he was unable to write his full name. Moreover, the witnesses have since died. The Probate Court has granted an application of the Public Trustee for letters of administration regarding the will.
HUGE PUFF BALL FOUND

Caused Tragedy
MONTREAL, Que., Oct. 2.—(By The Canadian Press)—A gas-heater without a flue caused the death by carbon monoxide poisoning of Mrs. Lucien Tessier, 40, and her ten-month-old boy here yesterday. The bodies were discovered by the dead woman's two daughters when they arrived home from school.
FALSE TEETH MYSTIFY NATIVES
False teeth owned by one of a party of missionaries was a great mystery to natives in New-Hebrides, according to Pastors Stewart and Truner, leaders of the party, on their arrival recently at Sydney, N. S. W. Only from a great distance would the natives dare to watch the removal and replacing of the teeth. They finally decided that the feat was "magic" and the missionary a witch doctor. The party also reported that feasting and dancing are the chief social outlets of these strange people. As many as 700 pigs are slaughtered for a single feast. In one small island, dancing grounds were found every half mile. "Our arrival caused quite a stir," the missionaries declare. "The women and children ran off and hid themselves, while many of the men, who were looking upon white faces for the first time, uttered deep groans of consternation."
AGED GERMS BLAMED FOR DEATH
Can germs survive 240 years and still be fatal, is a question being debated by European scientists following the death of Philip Kurnyave, a stonemason, at Kesmark, Hungary. While making repairs and alterations in the ancient Roman Catholic Church at Kesmark, Kurnyave opened a tomb in which a mother and her four-year-old child had been buried 240 years ago. Shortly after he had completed his work the man was taken violently ill and died the following day. The attending doctor declared death was from infection. As the mother and child are believed to have died from an infectious disease, some doctors are suggesting that the germs transformed themselves into spore, survived the tomb for nearly two and one-half centuries, and were absorbed into the system of the stonemason.

ONTARIO TOWN TAKEN OVER BY SKUNKS
ORILLA, Ont., Oct. 2.—(U.P.)—Orilla has a problem, a smelly and distasteful one. It concerns skunks. Not one skunk, nor two, nor three, but an army of them.
The skunks have invaded the waterfront, preventing owners from entering their bathhouses, and have approached the town hall.
One entered an unfinished sewer and halted construction.
The striped cats have rid the town of rats, but residents say they would rather have the rats than the odors.
IN DAYS OF YORE
Hurrah—we're off! This girl is riding in front seat of one of 31 year old cars that took part in recent "old cracks" race at Eastbourne, England. A car had to be 25 years old to enter.

Reminders and Reviews

In all probability George Romney gave Sir Joshua Reynolds more anxious hours than his other rival Gainsborough. Romney was alert and talented, and eleven years younger than Sir Joshua; had he been as painstaking as the older man there would have been cause for uneasiness. As it was, admiration was divided between them in London and there was a striking similarity in their work.
Romney lacked the advantage of early training. His father was a cabinet-maker in Dalton-le-Furness and expected George to follow the same trade, but the boy displayed more skill in carving than in building, and was allowed to apprentice himself to a mediocre painter named Steele, who was too erratic to be a good instructor.
The young artist contracted a fever when he was twenty-two, and on recovery, married his nurse who was, we are told, "a sweet-natured girl." She certainly must have been. Romney left her and their two children when he was twenty-seven and established himself in London as a bachelor. True, he shared his savings with her on leaving and contributed always to the support of the family, but with the exception of two brief visits, he returned to his wife only when he was ready to die: (remembering, perhaps, what an excellent nurse she had been.)
He became popular in London, but he did not contribute to the Royal Academy or seek honors from that source. There was a coldness between himself and the president, Sir Joshua, whose final word had been accepted by the Society of Arts, and robbed Romney of a prize for his "Death of General Wolfe" which was to have been given second place.
In 1764 he visited Paris and studied the works of Rubens, then in the Luxembourg Gallery. He selected a residence near the studio of Sir Joshua for the purpose, one imagines, of showing his rival his (Romney's) following in the matter of wealthy and famous patrons. But he lacked Reynolds' strength of character and wearied of portrait work, though it was netting him an income of nearly eight thousand dollars a year. The wanderlust called again in 1773 and he went to Rome to study the old masters. He did some profitable sketching at the Vatican and more at Parma, where the productions of Correggio fascinated him, and greatly influenced his later work.
When he returned to London two years later he established himself at Cavendish square, and resumed his portrait work. We are told that, in ten years, his income was fifteen thousand a year in our money, and he was beginning to plan large subjects from mythology; idealistic studies for which he was ill suited. When he met Lady Hamilton he gave himself up entirely to this type of painting. Using the "Divine Lady" as a model and inspiration he painted a Circe, a Bacchante, a Cassandra; Magdalene and a Joan of Arc. This lady of deadly charm seems to have bewitched poor Romney, who would have been more susceptible to beauty than Nelson. When E. Barrington gave us a "close-up" of "The Divine Lady" she included Romney in the study, if I remember correctly, but he was only another incident in the adventurous career of Lady Hamilton.
If Romney had had the stability—perhaps, too, the ability—to execute all that he planned, even Reynolds would have been eclipsed; however, he seldom got beyond a sketch or the half-covered canvas of a mighty undertaking. His imagination carried him to great heights but the wings of his purpose were not strong enough for sustained flights. Then, too, he was handicapped by defective early training. He had a natural talent for portrait painting, but the technical demands of a larger work often discouraged him. Not always, though; his scene from Shakespeare's Tempest is that type of painting, as is also his "Infant Shakespeare Attended by the Passions."
Critics tell us we must look to Romney's portraits for his greatness, and the best of these are "Studies of Wilkes and Cowper"; his delicate and dignified full length of William Beckford, his "Parson's Daughter," in the National Gallery, and his "Duchess of Gordon and her Son." His more frequently printed works are "Lady Craven," "Mrs. and Mr. Lindow," and "Lady Kerr." Romney died November 15, 1802.
Allan Ramsay, son of the author of the "Gentle Shepherd," was painting in Scotland during the life time of Romney. He studied in London and in Italy but lived the VISITING REBEKAH—Unity Rebekah Lodge, No. 12, Annapolis Royal, received a visit last week from Mrs. Ruby Houle, of Charlottetown, P. E. I., vice-president of the Rebekah Assembly. In the afternoon Mrs. Houle was entertained at a banquet by the Past Noble Grand Club, and over fifty were present at the evening meeting, when a degree was conferred on one candidate. Speeches were made by several members of the Lodge, and Mrs. Agnes Beeler, D. D. P., presented the guest of honor with the Rebekah pin, as a souvenir of her visit to Nova Scotia. During her stay in town, Mrs. Houle and her husband, Frederic Houle, were guests of Mrs. Harold Beeler.

MACCALLUM-CAMPBELL—Miss Lillian G. Campbell of Lindsey E. and David G. MacCallum of Bedeque, P. E. I. were united in marriage by Dr. J. Lee Mitchell Saturday evening at 7 o'clock, the ceremony taking place in the parsonage of the Second Congregational Church in Peck St. There were no attendants. The newly-weds left immediately on an automobile trip through New Hampshire, New York, Niagara Falls and Montreal after which they will continue on to Prince Edward Island, where they will make their home in Charlottetown. The bride was attired in a brown suit of French beaver with hat, shoes and stockings to match. The bride is the daughter of Mrs. Angus Campbell of North Wiltshire, P. E. I. and the bridegroom, the son of Mrs. Albert MacCallum of Bedeque, P. E. I.—Athleboro Sun.

greater part of his life in Edinburgh where his best works were produced. During this unhurried period he gave the best that was in him to his work, and we are told his earlier paintings show a perfection of line and delicacy of touch that is absent from his later work. It is said that the portrait of his wife in the Scottish National Gallery is Ramsay's masterpiece.
When he became court painter to King George the Third he spent most of his time painting his royal patron, who was in the habit of presenting his portraits to ambassadors and colonial governors. They were executed (the portraits, not the ambassadors or governors) in such numbers that Ramsay could paint the face only, using a host of assistants for the "filling in." He left fifty royal portraits to be finished when he went south for his health. He died at Dover, August, 1734, aged seventy-one years.

GRID STARS GET "HOT FEET"
HAYS, Kan., Oct. 2.—(U.P.)—Confusion of a bottle of carbolic acid with one containing tannic acid has taken much of the optimism from supporters of the Fort Hays State college football team. Three lettermen and a first string quarterback are out of the game for the season because a locker room attendant bathed their feet in contents of the wrong bottle.
FOREST 90 PER CENT OF COUNTY
HARRISBURG, Pa., Oct. 2 (U. P.)—Forests cover 90 per cent of the entire area of McKean County, the Pennsylvania Department of Forest and Waters reported. There are 565,000 acres of woodland in the county, the largest county forest acreage in the state. Potter County has 510,000, Clearfield 500,000 and Centre 496,000.
