would not suggest that we attempt to educate the manufacturer of booze into giving up the business and seeing that no one else takes up the job. Surely the prohibitionists have arrived at the place to which the Moderationists plead that we come by way of education. And despite the possibility of the favourite jibe of the "wets" against "wet" prohibitionists, the vast majority of prohibitionists are DRY. The drunkard is simply a Moderationist run to excess—not to say to seed. Therefore the scope of education is wholly within the field and faith of the Moderationist. What do they want to know more than they do? Anything more about the damnable effects of alcoholic beverages on the individual and social and spiritual life? Anything more about the impossibilities of alcohol-beverages in a rapidly moving, complex life such as we are living today? Pray, what is it we are to educate them in?

After all it is not the fact that all we need in this fight is that each should unselfishly accept the truth such knowledge as we have brought to us concerning the evils of liquor drinking, and then stand for the law that conserves that truth. But no, we are told that Moderationist and all his ilk would have us take the way to education. For they want nothing so much as delay in action that will take from them their booze.

And while we are educating a generation the Moderationist (acting in the interests of the "True Temperance Reform" bunch in the city of Halifax in 1929, a bunch of citizens that have never raised their voice or their organizational head since, that one is tempted to believe that it emanates from the same "spring" source. It is to say the least disgusting to those who know what "Moderation" means.

I am, Sir, etc.,
BERT WAINER.

Threw Babies Out In 18th Century

MANCHESTER, Feb. 25.—(C.P.)—The History of the Foundling Hospital, by R. H. Nichols and F. A. Wray is reviewed in the English press.

"The Greeks exposed the infants they did not want to keep (mostly girls), to die in pots by the roadside in London during the early part of the 18th century some people threw theirs on to dungheils.

"The sight of these outcast babies moved Thomas Coram, retired sea captain and shipwright, to his great campaign of mercy, resulting in the foundation in 1739 of that famous institution the Foundling Hospital whose detailed early history from minutes and official records is given in this well-documented volume.

"The important help given in early years by Handel and Hogarth and other musicians and artists is well described and excellently illustrated, but the most interesting chapters are those dealing with the disastrous years when, instead of taking in many children as they had room for, the governors agreed, in return for a Parliamentary grant, to receive any child that was presented.

"They did not expect more infants than the number of those usually exposed in streets and people's doors, or deserted in parish workhouses, but they found the hospital besieged. A trade grew up in bringing infants from country districts at so much a head, and parish authorities seized the chance of ridding themselves of possible burdens on the rates. Dying children were often dumped at the gates to save the cost of burial. Indiscriminate admission lasted from 1768 to 1769, when Parliament stopped grants except for children for such children already admitted as survived. Out of 14,934 Parliamentary children received during

Dr. Bayton Miller, of the Case School of Applied Science has been science's doubting thomas for 25 years, repeating this experiment to show that the tiny effect obtained was nevertheless real.

Dr. Cartmell's calculations today are to the effect that the original experimenters should not have expected the big "effect," which they never got. The should have expected only a tiny one, just about the kind that Dr. Miller gets.

Challenges of the accuracy of the mathematics on which expectations of the big "effect" rested have been made before and have not stood the test of rigid examination. Other physicists will go over Dr. Cartmell's calculations as has been done with previous challenges.

Physicists Study Hypothetical Ether

NEW YORK, Feb. 26.—(A.P.)—The possibility of real existence of the hypothetical ether, an invisible medium filling all space, was revived today by some new mathematical calculations presented to the American Physical Society.

W. B. Cartmell of the University of Montreal showed computations that the formula by which existence of ether has been ruled out may be in error.

His calculations go back to the great experiment begun in 1884 by Michelson and Morley, which was taken by Einstein and most other scientists as proving there was no ether. The two measured the "ether drift."

The experiment was like measuring the water passing a boat being rowed in the moving current of a river. The water would pass the boat faster when it was rowed up stream than downstream, if the rowing was at the same rate.

Light, this experiment held, should act like the water, because it travels as pulsations in ether, and the earth is moving through the ether. The earth's known motion is about 18 miles a second.

Michelson and Morley set up an interferometer, a cross, at whose centre a beam of light was split. So that half of it travelled at right angles to the other half out of ends of the cross bars. These split beams were reflected back. At the point where the reunited they should show "fringes" of color, if there was a difference in their velocity in one direction as compared with the other.

There was a difference, but it was far less than expected. So much less that the experiment was adjudged as showing no ether existed.

Belgians Warned of Reich Armies Investing Rhine

BRUSSELS, Feb. 26.—(C.P.)—Nightmare memories of 1914, when gray-clad German hordes swept across the frontier the overhwhelm Belgium, darkened the nation today as anxious Belgians are told about camouflaged massing of German troops in the demilitarized Rhineland.

"The demilitarized zone along the Rhine is, in fact, remilitarized," said an article in the Brussels "Sole" written by a retired Belgian commander. "By the end of 1935 Germany will be able to muster a first-line army totalling 2,280,000 fully-trained soldiers.

"Mobilized during the night, a German motorized division could reach Leige by 7 a. m. Namur by noon and Brussels and Antwerp by 2 p. m."

These claims rang afresh a tocsin already sounded by Albert Devez, minister of defence.

Sketching the changed conditions on the eastern frontier since 1928, when the allied occupied the Rhine, the German army was merely an unmotivated rehswehr. Devez warned that Belgium today stands in grave danger of invasion—this time, possibly, across the Dutch border.

Devez read a secret dossier, drawn with the military situation to the defence committees of both the senate and the chamber of deputies, and urged the immediate bolstering of Belgium's skeleton army of only 40,000 soldiers.

Although the cabinet's power automatically lapsed March 31, Devez stressed that a postponement of even two months might endanger the country's security.

Belgium's only minister to remain in office through four successive cabinets, Devez has turned to both King Leopold and Premier Van Zeeland for support to prepare for the eventuality of Germany's attempting military re-occupation of the Rhine zone.

The article, in the newspaper "Sole" claimed, among other things:

"Germany possesses on the left bank of the Rhine two divisions (30,000 men) of Landes Polizei (national police) with full military equipment except artillery.

"The missing artillery, however, is posted on the right bank of the Rhine. Four of the 32 new German artillery divisions actually are residing in the demilitarized zone.

"Numerous semi-military formations are established on the left bank of the Rhine. One of them, the labor service, has camps close to the Belgian border.

"Identified formations include two groups of native brown shirts, comprising five or six brigades, making a total of 150,000 men. Seven regiments of S. S., or senior Nazi guards, make another 20,000.

"A motorized corps of six regiments adds an additional 40,000.

"Germany has 250,000 fully equipped troops on the left bank of the Rhine.

"Viewing these figures, claimed as authentic by "Sole," Belgians look at their own tiny army of 40,000 men and wonder how they could stem another such invasion as swept over them 22 years ago.

On Sunday, February 16th, the home of John Robertson, Kingsboro, was destroyed by fire, which was caused by an over-heated stove pipe. British Columbia Legislature Opens

(C. P. by Guardian's Special Wire VICTORIA, Feb. 25.—British Columbia's 18th Legislature opened its third session here today in a subdued atmosphere of mourning for King George V.

Little indication of business to come before the session was contained in the Speech from the Throne read by Lieutenant-Governor J. W. Fordham Johnson.

The international situation was termed "disquieting" in a brief mention of world affairs, then reference was made to the recent Dominion-Provincial conference at which "good progress was made in important matters taken up which will be pursued to definite conclusions."

Introduction of legislation at the present session on several provincial problems was forecast as was a session when further legislation, including measures to improve the position of municipalities, will be considered.
