Lecture Last Night

Parliament, it being the cry that cutting down these hours would ruin the business.

A modest bill was finally passed cutting down the hours of children under sixteen, employed in cotton mills only, to twelve hours a day, and forbidding the employment altogether of those under nine. Inspection and enforcement was inefficient, however, and nothing of real value was accomplished.

Description of child life in these factories at that time were given by the speaker, who gave examples of the deplorable conditions that prevailed, deformity and death almost invariably resulting from continued employment at the unnatural tasks. The hours served were extremely long and in many cases the children when finally relieved from work were too fatigued even to eat before dropping off to sleep. On the defeat of the member who was leading the cause for reform, Ashley was asked to take up the reins of leadership, and consented. At this time he was obliged to work inordinately hard, following a quarrel with his father and consequent curtailing of his allowance. His investigations on conditions in the factories showed a state of affairs that beggared description, and it was found that children of only five years of age were working fourteen hours a day.

Sometimes they worked in the cotton factories for twenty-four hours at a time, although adults were on shorter shifts. His Commission looking into the conditions in the mines brought back reports that were just as dreadful, girls of six years of age being required to carry half hundred weight bags of coal upon their backs, and the employment of others amounting almost to solitary confinement of the worst order. In some cases they were employed in pushing coal cars through holes eighteen and twenty inches high. Often they were forced to stand ankle deep in water for twelve hours at a time and in instances they were found to have remained in the pit for thirty-six hours. When these conditions were reported in Parliament Ashley was asked to present a bill at once, and did so in a remarkable speech. However the bill was amended in the House of Lords and made much less effective, but the defects were afterwards righted by further legislation in 1850.

Speaking of this work one of Shaftesbury's biographers wrote that he did more than any single man, or any single government in English history, to check the raw power of the new industrial system. He also engaged in a vigorous campaign for the betterment of the national public health; and water supply, burial grounds, lodging houses and slums came under his attention. Lord John Russell in commenting on Shaftesbury's work in this respect, said that there was no man living had done so much to promote the welfare of the working classes, or done it so disinterestedly and unostentatiously.

At the beginning of the Crimean War Lord Shaftesbury suggested that a sanitary commission be sent out to the battle front, and Miss Florence Nightingale declared afterwards that this commission saved the British Army.

Those who had resented Shaftesbury's interference in factory conditions found a weapon to use against him in the deplorable conditions among the agriculturists on his ancestral estate when it came into his hands, but an inspection ten years after his inheritance showed the estate in excellent order. Another reform upon which Ashley spent much time and energy was in the lunacy laws, conditions in some of the so-called asylums of that day being disgraceful in the extreme, and there being absolutely no form of legislation governing their work. He succeeded in arousing the public conscience and indignation and important remedial legislation was the result.

Other reforms promoted by Shaftesbury included attempts to abolish the employment of boys as chimney sweeps, and here as in all the investigations conducted by him, shocking conditions were revealed. A bill in 1875 brought the scandals that went along with this labor, such as deaths by suffocation to an end. He also instituted schools in London for the poor and did all in his power to create an emigration policy, and succeeded in getting a small grant from the government for that purpose. He founded the National Refugees, well known today as the Shaftesbury Homes. His work among ex-convicts and criminals was also notable and his influence with them was for good.

His experience and interest in philanthropy colored his views of the education problem and the remark was made of him that he was quite content to leave the education of England to the Ragged schools. There was a day when Shaftesbury was thought of seriously as a leader of the Conservative party, but he lacked the qualities essential to a political career. He disapproved to the end of his life the democratic franchise and the ballot. His belief was that ancient communities like those of Europe must be governed either by traditional influences or by military force.
