Marriage Scales
DORIS ACCEPTS

Doris read Marianne's little note over her breakfast the following morning. It touched her. Marianne was so rarely willing to acknowledge that any breach between them was her fault.

Doris was as generous as she was proud. When anyone who had hurt her signified a willingness to atone she was ready to meet him more than half way.

It was scarcely convenient for her to accept Marianne's invitation for the week-end party at Three Oaks. The date of the charity pageant was rapidly approaching. Rehearsals were assuming feverish intensity. There were a million and one hitherto overlooked details to be seen to. She anticipated a hectic week and a strenuous Saturday and Sunday. Besides she hoped, through she didn't acknowledge it to herself, that Craig Cullum would meet her again at a drive and a tete-a-tete at the old farmhouse by the river. With true feminine generosity, she promised herself that she would decline if he asked her, but she also, that he'd be the cruel, relentless lover that he played on stage, and masterfully refuse to take "no" for an answer.

But, she re-read Marianne's note and the humility of it proved her undoing. Between the lines, she seemed to sense a softening of her sister's arrogant young spirit. For the first time, it occurred to her that Marianne might be needing her. She recalled, with a start of vexation at her own hegetness, that Marianne had been unwell for some time, and capricious the last time she had seen her; in fact, the strained relations between them were the result of Doris's own efforts to relieve Marianne's distresses with her husband and life in general.

Reproaching herself with the absorption in her own affairs which had made her neglectful of sisterly duty, Doris sat down at the desk in her pretty chintz-hung living room and dashed off a note of acceptance to Marianne.

A glance at her little desk clock assured her that Marianne would not be up yet, so she abandoned the idea of phoning, but her letter was very sweet and tender. She promised her that she would be at her party even if the whole pageant had to be postponed, but she begged leave, in deference to her truly crowded schedule, not to be expected to appear earlier on Saturday, as she would ordinarily have done on such an occasion.

"Ring for a messenger and tell him to deliver this right away, Blanche," she told her maid as she drew on her gloves preparatory to going downstairs. "And, by the way, you'd better look over my frocks and see that I've got everything fresh for a week-end in the country. If something needs replacing, phone me at the committee headquarters, or purchase it yourself. If you can possibly save me the bother."

She dashed down to her car, unconsciously conscious that she was keeping a whole committee of influential people awaiting fifteen minutes.

She was mutually sweet to Craig Cullum that afternoon at the rehearsal of the chorus so sweet, in fact, that infatuated young man was lifted to the seventh heaven. When she went to ten with him without her usual demur on the plea of work, he felt himself walking on the dizzy heights of Paradise.

Doris couldn't quite analyze what inspired her mood toward him that day. Her pride and her love still battled furiously. She was hurt and bewildered by his absence, but his bitterness acknowledged to herself that she loved him more and more.

Perhaps she was unconsciously urging him to make one more effort to see her on Sunday, his only real holiday, so she could have the cruel satisfaction of turning him down. Disappointed, she made a mental note to perfectly transparent excuses, he had sworn never again to try to repeat that wonderful Sunday when he had had her to himself for an entire afternoon and evening. Doris, per se, resented this. He wanted him to ask her on this particular Sunday because she had such a perfectly legitimate excuse for refusing. It was a logical, but none the less powerful.

Had she but known it, Cullum, encouraged by her sweetness and friendliness, was inwardly raging because he was forced to spend the coming week-end at the Page country place in the name of friendship. He felt somehow that Doris would give him Sunday, if he asked for it—and there were so pitifully few Sundays left before his duty closed and he sailed for London. On his one free day when he might have borne the girl he loved off somewhere from the people and things that constantly demanded her attention.

As a result of this conflict of desire and duty, he and Doris parted in a haze of gloom and disappointment. The heart of each was aching with love, unconfessed, and difficult to conceal longer.

Gas In The Stomach Is Dangerous

Recommend Daily Use of Magnesia To Overcome Trouble Caused by Fermenting Food and Acid Indigestion

Gas and wind in the stomach accompanied by that full, bloated feeling after eating are almost certain evidence of the presence of excessive hydrochloric acid in the stomach creating so-called "acid indigestion." Acid stomachs are dangerous because they contain too much acid irritate the delicate lining of the stomach, often leading to gastritis accompanied by serious stomach ulcers. Food ferments and sours, creating the distressing gas which distends the stomach and hampers the normal functions of the vital internal organs, often affecting the heart.

It is the worst of folly to neglect such a serious condition or to treat with ordinary digestive aids which have no neutralizing effect on the stomach acids. Instead get from any drugist a few ounces of Blaurated Magnesia and take a teaspoonful in a quart glass of water right after eating. This will drive the acid, wind and heat right out of the body, sweeten the stomach, neutralize the excess acid and prevent its formation. Blaurated Magnesia (in powder or tablet form) never liquid or milk) is harmless to the stomach and the best form of magnesia for stomach purposes. It is used by thousands of people who enjoy their meals with no more fear of indigestion.
