Grey Roses (Continued from Page 2) "You like our village?" asked Thea, swinging round slowly upon the piano stool. "It's considered quite attractive—Not a show place enough to lure visitors, but still attractive." "Of course we haven't any showy scenery—no river, no real woods, or anything." "You have the Downs," said Jim. "Yes, I love them, don't you? I used to get up early sometimes and go for long walks over them in the dawn. You hear the larks 'then—there's nothing quite like larks in full song. They sound so gloriously free and full of life." Her face was at once joyous and wistful as if she looked back upon a freedom she herself had once enjoyed. "Of course, that was before I was married," she said quite simply. "I've had rather a troublesome illness since, you know, and I haven't been able to do so much walking." "Your health won't permit those long walks just yet," said her husband sharply. "Yes, I know. I seem to tire awfully easily, but that's because I'm out of condition." "You will be yourself again, of course, if you obey orders and take care of yourself," said Austin Hart, with heavy indulgence. "I don't know. But when I feel so well—" She rose shaking the subject from her, and came to the table, and dipped her face into the roses, her black hair slipping down softly upon the lavender-dusted petals. Hart watched her without a smile, his eyes narrow and shifty.
