Provinces Choose Fairly Flowers As Official Emblems

By ALAN RANDALL, Canadian Press Staff Writer

About now, along the railway right-of-way and on the road allowances the lilium philadelphum and anemium is spreading its orange patches over the Saskatchewan prairies, last of the official flower emblems of Canada's provinces.

The lilium philadelphum and anemium, for those not up on the botanical names, is nothing more or less than the prairie lily, commonly known as the tiger lily, deep orange, dark-brown-spotted, and prolific in some parts of the Prairies.

Long since the Manitoba flower emblem has faded in this year of 1946—the delicate furred Prairie anemone or crocus which earlier this year made the purple carpet of the prairie grassland from the Manitoba border clear through to the Rockies and on into them wherever the railway right of way allowed grass to grow in the mountain cuts.

Altogether six of the nine official flower emblems have yet to be chosen by the provinces. The children of the foothills province made this choice. Asked for rose, pink five-petaled, herby and sweet-scented, the most popular flower in the province. Mostly one of the growing scented but indomitable in the north, it is more lush and with a tendency to climb along meadow fences, and a few western farm children remember the July cent of new-mown hay and the wild rose.

New Brunswick, the other province to have chosen its emblem has the wild violet, another spring flower native to low-lying, shady country, particularly woodland where it comes in yellow, violet and white.

Quebec, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia have yet to choose flowers but in the Pacific Coast provinces natives have a soft spot for the pale cream-colored flower of the dogwood tree. For a time it was picked for the tree, but when it was found that some spring flowers, are close relatives.

Said why Nova Scotia chose the trailing arbutus has been lost in the wooded places of Nova Scotia and it appears with a thistle—tribute to the Scots who came to a new land—in the provincial coat of arms.

Met My Husband" and also some of the best snow has melted the trailing arbutus comes to the wooded places of Nova Scotia and it appears with a thistle—tribute to the Scots who came to a new land—in the provincial coat of arms.
