SANDRA THE JEALOUS

By Jane Phelps

ROSE MAKES REMARKS THAT HURT

CHAPTER CIV.

"I am having such a good time!" Rose declared to Everett. I looked at her in amazement. She had told Walter Kemp she didn't want to go, she had led him—and me—to think she was going to be bored. That Rose was a born coquette, I had not realized.

"So am I," he replied genially. He and Rose had just danced a fox trot. "You dance very well," he added.

"Not so well as Sandra," she returned. "She always danced better than any of us."

I almost held my breath so that I might hear Everett's reply: "Sandra is very graceful. Naturally she would dance well."

My cheeks burned, and I knew they were flushed with pleasure. Everett was so chary with his compliments that one of them meant more than twice as much said by another. He never told me he had said I danced well.

"Indeed she is!" Rose answered emphatically. "I only wish I were as graceful."

"You do very nicely as you are," he returned gallantly.

It seemed to me that Everett always said just the right thing when others were around—I mean seldom did he say them about me, that I always blushed and showed my pleasure. So now Rose laughingly said:

"You should say nice things about Sandra often, Mr. Graham. See her blush."

Everett just glanced at me, but made no remark, and Rose chatted gaily through the remainder of the meal. I thanked Everett for giving us such a nice evening. I went into the room Rose was occupying to read with her a bit while Everett chatted his evening papers.

"The idea of your thanking your own husband for taking you out. I'll bet a nickel his first wife didn't!"

"I don't see why I shouldn't thank him. He gave his entire evening up to entertaining us."

"He knows how to order a dinner, all right, but I wouldn't be so meek," Sandra. Number One wasn't."

"What do you know about it?" "Oh, Walter Kemp told me all about the merry chase she led Mr. Graham! How she did anything she wanted to do, and that he loved the very ground she walked on. Men don't like nabby pabby women; they like us to have some spunk, and demand our rights."

"Perhaps," I didn't know what to say. I was amazed that Rose and Kemp had discussed me, my affairs.

"There's no 'perhaps' about it. That's why I meant when I said I didn't see why you should thank your own husband for taking you out. It's his duty." Then, after a moment: "I don't believe your mother or mine ever thought of such a thing as saying 'thank you' when our fathers took them anywhere."

"Life is rather different in a big town, Rose," I said for want of something better. "Men have more demands upon their time, men who have big business to manage. Then, since I have been married to Everett I have learned a lot of things I never knew before, and one is that courtesy—politeness to each other—makes things easier all around. Everett is always courteous even when displeased."

"I'd rather he'd be a little more loving if he were my husband, and a little less polite. At times I should fear he was not married to me if I were you."

"What a notion! Seriously, Rose, I would change places with," I had said. "I am terribly proud and fond of him. I don't know anyone I would change places with," I had to say something to assure Rose of my love for Everett. I did not want her to talk to Kemp about me—as if I cared nothing for my husband because he was older and was strict with me.

"I am awfully glad if you are happy at last with him, Sandra. You weren't very happy when I was here before, you know. But I would assert myself a little more if I were in your place. If you have to be Number Two, you might as well take advantage of what number one did to have a good time. From what I hear she didn't miss a track."

"What a dreadful expression," I replied, laughing in spite of myself at Rose's slang. Everett saved me from making any other reply by calling to me that it was late, and time to retire.

"Tomorrow—Worry Over Rose and Walter Kemp."

A Trip Through Great Britain

By M. McKenzie

My reason for writing this is to try to give you an idea of some of the things and places which I saw while I leave from France.

Coming on the latter part of October, 1916, while on my way to Edinburgh, I met a Sergeant of the Royal Scots who was going there also. He invited me to his home and I had a very enjoyable time, as I was the first one of Canada's Army that his family had ever met.

The day following my arrival I started out to see the sights. Of course my chief thought was to see the celebrated "Edinburgh Castle"—a fine imposing building in the heart of the city itself, immediately opposite Salisbury crags.

Inside, the Castle is magnificent. One of the finest sights in it, is that of the "Royal Banqueting Hall" where all state functions were held. Both sides of the room are lined with all kinds of old fashioned war trappings including armour, great massive plate which we could not imagine a soldier of the present day wearing—truly one of the lost arts as there is no such fine work turned out today.

There were also the colours carried to battle by the kings of long ago, among them being the flag carried into battle by Robert Bruce when he defeated the English at Bannockburn. I shall never forget the feeling of awe that came over me as I stood in the presence of all these relics of the old day, and thought deeply of their associations, in another part of the Castle is a place of worship called "Queen Elizabeth's Chapel" I think I am quite safe in saying, the smallest church I had ever seen.

Directly opposite the Castle is a house called "The Cannon Ball House". The reason it is called by this name is because that at one time during one of the sieges, a cannon ball missing the Castle, embedded itself in the wall. This cannon ball can be seen to this day.

Another beautiful sight is that of the zoological gardens where they have all kinds of animals and birds. Strangely enough I saw there for the first time, the Canadian beaver at work.

One of the most instructive places of the city is the Museum. Here we are brought face to face with the fact that truth is indeed stranger than fiction. I could write of nothing more strange or wonderful than what I saw there. Here I saw the cradle in which Queen Mary was rocked when a child. Egyptian mummies, hundreds of years old, all kinds of machinery etc. Words fail to describe it adequately.

During my stay in Edinburgh I visited quite a number of places including the home of Robert Burns the immortal Scottish poet.

Some of my readers will probably remember that in April of 1916, the Germans made an air-raid on Edinburgh. It was generally believed to have been an attempt to blow up the Waverly Station, which as you all know, is probably the largest in the world. The bomb landed just opposite in a big hotel of the same name causing serious loss to both life and property.

I recall talking with a lady whose house was partially damaged by the explosion. I shall never forget the look on her face, as she related the story to me. She seemed to live it all over again. I could not help after all, feeling thankful that it was not in Charlottetown. This lady says that there is only one good German and that's a dead one. I say so too.
