CHAPTER 23

INSIDE THE LITTLE CLUB

The little club that called itself, with bromidic pertness, "Sans Souci", like many another club of its sort, was not exactly questionable in its aims and offerings, but most decidedly running in cheerful defiance of the Volstead act.

Clarence Collins was not a member of it nor had he ordinarily the price of an evening's admission, but a bootlegger friend, in return for a favor that Clarence had done him, had scrawled his influential initials on one of the discreetly engraved "You are cordially invited to a supper dance" cards with which the proprietors veiled their actual business, and Clarence, to all practical intents and purposes, owned that solid old brownstone into which he was ushering his fair guest, the petite Molly Benedict.

The evening was young, barely half-past ten o'clock, which was far too early for the gayety to be really under way. Indeed, Molly and Clarence were among the earliest arrivals. Most of the Sans Souci's guests waited until after the theatres closed before they sought its cosy confines.

A discreetly garbed maid opened the door for them the wide hall-way looked perfectly reassuring to the somewhat perturbed Molly.

Clarence passed over his card with a condescending air. Another maid tripped out to lead Molly to a dressing room on the upper floor within whose exquisitely appointed confines Molly began to feel that she had been decidedly foolish to be so apprehensive.

A fat, coloured woman, in crackling black taffeta, placidly knitting, presided over this rose and grey boudoir.

"Evening, honey," she greeted Molly. The little maid who had shown Molly the way, took her coat, rather deliberately turned its shabby lining outside, pinned a tag to it and handed the duplicate to Molly with a significant cough.

And Molly, who had thoughtlessly left home without her purse, flushed with annoyance at lacking the anticipated tip.

Two gorgeously garbed women were preening themselves at the long dressing table. One of them, a fat, jolly sort, was busily engaged in beading already smudgy eyelashes. She adroitly looked Molly over from the vantage point of the mirror. This woman fairly bulged from a gaudily beaded cerise georgette frock. And she fairly dripped earrings, bracelets and necklaces.

"—so I says to her," she continued an animated conversation with her thin companion, "if you can't have it to the hotel not later than six I don't want it. I'm going to a swell party at a private club and that's all I'm getting it for and tomorrow is no use."

The slender woman, who was resplendent in gold tissue, didn't seem especially interested in the cerise georgette's shopping troubles. She only deigned a bored,

"It's a cute model but much too tight for you, Kitty—" and added with a wide yawn, "Joe's got a pretty good bun on already hasn't he?"

Her voice was as metallic as her frock. Molly fairly winced from its nasal tones.

The cerise georgette sighed.

"I'll tell the world he has, that last Scotch we got is something terrible. A couple shots of it and you're gone—"

"Listen, Kitty," advised the slender woman, "it's none of my business, I understand that, but I think you gotta watch your step with Joe. You gotta get him to lay off the stuff, you have. You know what the doctor told him—"

Faint sounds of music floated upward, the two women, having generously roughed themselves, hurried out leaving Molly staring at a much too white Molly Benedict in that mirror.

"If you forgot your 'vanity'," suggested the knitter, "I can give you the loan of some rouge—"

But the rouge that she proferred was so violent in tone and the puff that accompanied so dusty that Molly hadn't the heart to use it.

She went down stairs most reluctantly, passing still more elaborately garbed women than those she had already seen.

Clarence was awaiting her anxiously, his sleekly pomaded black hair glistening under the hall light.

He himself was much impressed with his surroundings.

Like the lady who wore cerise georgette, it seemed to him that this was indeed "a swell party in a swell private club," and he thought he must be making a tremendous impression upon the modest little widow.

Molly, who for once found herself proud, rather than ashamed of her simple black lace frock, thought she had never seen anything more comically garish than the room to which Clarence was leading her. The wide drawing-rooms of the old house had been thrown together to provide suitable space for dancing, and the "Ball room" thus evolved had been decorated by some intrepid artist whose instructions had been "Kid, make it gyptian, King Tut stuff is all the go—"

So the walls were literally crammed with figures done in gilt and purple and green and orange, Ptolmies and their slaves the like of which the Nile itself had never seen! The quaint old lighting fixtures were swathed in weirdly printed silks adorned with much beaded tassels, and from an alcove where once some lovely daughter of old New York had strummed her harp, came the pandemonium wrought by a trap drummer and his saxophone pal.

"Some class, eh?" gloated Clarence. "But before we start trotting come around back through the hall." He thrust his arm companionably through hers, "I want to show you something—even if you don't want a drink yourself—you're going to be surprised at something I got to show you—"

He led the way to what had once been the butler's pantry in the old days. It was now equipped with a mahogany bar and a brass rail and a huge mirror that had been rescued from some abandoned ... and was presided over by an ... dex white-coated barkeep who ... dispense, as Clarence had p...
