Plan World Cruise In 80-foot Ketch

By Leslie Brodie
(Canadian Press Correspondent)
SYDNEY, Australia, Oct. 7 — (CP) — A group of 20 adventurous Australians plan to sail out of Melbourne in December on a 60,000-mile world cruise in an 80-foot ketch, the Shangri-la.

Captain of the ketch and organizer of the voyage is Edward W. Player, a Melbourne commercial artist.

An advertisement for 19 men to form his crew got 520 replies from men and women all over Australia and New Zealand who were willing to sail and pay $1,120 as their share in buying the ketch.

From them Player finally selected two doctors, two chemists, a dentist, a geologist, a geographer, an accountant, a radio-artist, a writer, a photographer, three business men, a salesman, an ex-soldier, three merchant navy officers, and a masseur.

Women of all ages applied—the youngest a girl of 17 who complained that "women never get a break," and the oldest a widow of 50 who wanted to be caretaker to the men on the trip.

The route planned for the Shangri-la is to China, Africa, Turkey, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Norway, Scotland, England, America, and then homeward via South America and New Zealand.

They are taking a jeep and a motor-cycle, and two 2-pounder guns—just in case they run into

Author Names Myths

By WILLIAM BOSS
NEW YORK, Oct. 6 — (CP) — For those who care, "Dark December" (Ziff-Davis), by Robert Merriam will be a "must."

The story of Hitler's last great offensive — the December, 1945 Ardennes push known as the "Battle of the Bulge" — disposes of many popular myths, some of them honest misapprehensions, others one suspects of having been concocted to allay an alarmed public at home.

Merriam, who served in the ranks of the United States army for four years, ultimately reaching the rank of captain, was combat reporter for the Ninth Army during the battle. Later he was made chief of the Ardennes section of the historical division and spent eight months preparing an official history. Notes from this, as well as personal material, went into "Dark December."

Now youngest member of Chicago city council, he is vice-chairman of its committee on housing, working on a program to re-develop the city's slum areas.

Merriam reveals a plausible picture of the responsibility at the various levels for the Allied debacle it was; shows the cleverness of the German build-up and its accomplishment of utter surprise, and tells in broad terms of the Allied rally which crushed the bulge and shot on to final victory in five months.

He makes the point that the Ardennes offensive was Hitler's own brainchild, not von Rundstedt's, and was devised after the abortive July, 1944, bomb plot. As a surprise attack it was wholly successful. For three days Allied intelligence officers, who had predicted that the days of German offensives were over for all time, were unable to determine either its intensity or its scope.

He establishes that Hitler drove neither for Paris nor Liege, but for Antwerp, intending to divide the Allies' lines of communication and supply, and seize one of their main ports.

Disposes Kidnap Buzz
And he also disposes of the rumors that Otto Skorzy, German commando leader recently acquitted of war crimes charges, intended to kidnap General Eisenhower after effecting a rendezvous in Paris with members of his command attired in United States army uniforms. Hitler, Merriam says, banked on Eisenhower not having authority to deploy his troops to meet so vast a threat, counting on the delay that would be caused by top-level, inter-Allied planning to exploit the confusion he was confident of causing — and did.

Eisenhower, however, had supreme authority, and promptly made the "logical" decision — splitting the battlefield in two. Montgomery with the 21st Army group and the United States Ninth Army, in the Northern sector, and Gen. Omar Bradley, with the United States First and Third armies in the Southern, were given complete authority in fighting their battle to eliminate the bulge.

That time was gained for the necessary troop deployments and the bulge was effectively contained, was due to heroic stand, often in small numbers, equally often by troops accustomed only to rear echelon duties who found themselves, by accident of the German plan more than by any Allied strategy or defence, defenders of key positions. Often they delayed long enough for positions to be prepared behind them, sometimes, as at Bastogne, they held out for their own localities to be built up.

FOWL-CHICK-EGG FARMING CLICKS
STEINBACH, Man., Oct. 8.—(CP) — Farmers who aren't employed in the poultry business around this district are scarcer—to work an old phrase—than hen's teeth. Merriamites form most of the population and this "large-scale poultry area of Manitoba" is easily maintaining its reputation.

Specialized agriculture is the vogue since large land holdings are in the minority, farmers going in for poultry production in the main although sugar beets, sun flower seeds and potatoes also are grown.

But Steinbach is one of the main reasons why the net poultry production of the province grew from a value of $2,896,000 in 1933 to $18,861,000 last year.
