CHAPTER XI UP COUNTRY AT LAST

Major Salter's party arrived at Carbonaras shortly before sunset on the following day... It had been a long and tiring journey by rail from Havana to Antilla.

As a result, he had been driven back upon his own thoughts for days... He had said nothing to his daughter or Toby of his encounter with Mr. Becker.

All these would be legally his of course... He had now discarded his original theory that the man had mistakenly assumed her to be the heir-at-law.

He had now discarded his original theory that the man had mistakenly assumed her to be the heir-at-law... He was convinced that his insistence on going on here was due to quite another reason.

It was a comforting thought, and as he finished his final drink before going in to lunch, he blessed the chance that had thrown him in the American's path on the previous evening.

He had slept solidly through the afternoon, and awoke only when the train drew to a stop... where they turned out on to the platform and he found himself given the task of superintending the unloading of the baggage.

He was reluctantly compelled to admit that that young man seemed to have a fair amount of organizing ability... He was a man of a certain type.

It was an excellent road, and the driver kept up a steady rity miles an hour... dense woods stretched blackly up to where the jagged peaks of the scarp-towers towered up into the deep blue sky.

The boss called one of his clerks into his private office... "I have noticed, Johnson," he began, "that you of all my clerks, seem to put your whole life and soul into your work."

"Yes, sir?" he asked, waiting for what he thought was coming next... "And so, Johnson," his employer went on, "I am forced, much against my will, to fire you. It is such chaps as you who go out and start rival establishments."

"No; they're all down on the coast," he explained. The produce used to be carried round by sea, but when this road is completed, the crops will be taken into Antilla by road... The Major eyed him with a spark of interest.

"I expect so," Toby told him. "It just depends upon whether it's in production or not."... "Oh, sure," he said, "but I'm confident, and immediately fell to speculating pleasantly on the possibility of setting himself up as a planter, in order to reap the full advantage of his late brother's speculation."

Far ahead of them, a large colony of wooden huts marked the end of the road... The car came to a halt some distance short of this scene of activity, where a little group of men and a couple of mule carts stood waiting beside the road.

He came forward as the car stopped, and approached Diana with a smile which she recognized readily enough... "Good day to you!" he greeted her. "You'll be Miss Diana Salter, I take it? I got your wire, and I'm glad you've turned up safely."

"Good afternoon — er — Father," Diana responded, taking his outstretched hand... "You meet us like this? This is my father, Major Salter. And this is Mr. Bishop."

The priest shook hands with them

Method: Cream the shortening thoroughly and gradually cream in the sugar. Beat the egg and add to the creamed mixture and beat until light.

Method: Peel the orange and dice it. Slice the banana, and halves or quarters the strawberries. Add the sugar and mix well. Let stand, then fill baked shell with this and top with apple flour.

both, and then glanced at the pile of luggage which the driver was unstrapping from the rear of the car... He turned to the two muleteers and addressed them in rapid Spanish.

"Let's be getting along," he said to Diana. "The luggage will come along down a rough, stony track which dropped steeply down the hillside among the trees."

Then one day the divorce microbe bit a banker, who had fallen in love with a neighbor's wife... Of course, it is naive to imagine that divorce is a hereditary disease.

The members of it are too likely to follow Mother's and Father's example and check out when they find out that marriage has some mighty rough sledding in it... But, and this often happens, the men and women who have seen in their own families the misery that divorce brings, and the frustration

So I guess, after all, we had better leave it to the men. DOROTHY DIX.

DIVORCE IS NOT HEREDITARY BUT WATCH MUST BE KEPT

Once the Microbe Bites Into a Family or Community, There is Danger of the "Disease" Spreading

A young woman who is hesitating about marrying an attractive youth because his grandmother and his grandfather, his mother, father and several of his sisters and brothers have been divorced, asks me if divorce is hereditary... Well, yes and no. Probably no baby is born with a ticket to Reno in its mouth.

people are maimed and injured besides the two who pulled down the building. And, above all, it shows that the husband or the wife, or both, are quitters who couldn't take it when the romance folded up.

Then there would be the point of view on the subject one would naturally have who had been brought up in a household in which divorce was a commonplace, and having half a dozen different mothers and fathers who looked upon as merely an improvement on Nature.

Certainly marriage in a family never been a divorce a tragedy and a disgrace is much more likely to endure than the family which thinks that losing your taste for your husband or wife is a perfectly good reason for changing him or her for someone who suits your fancy of the moment.

But whether or not divorce is hereditary, it is certainly catching. It is as contagious as the flu. Not alone is it perennially epidemic in Hollywood. It sweeps over the whole country. Let one man or woman show prominence in any community get the divorce germ in their systems and before you know it half of the people are fatally stricken with decrees absolute.

I know one sedate, conservative, good-looking, small town in which for years and years there had never been a divorce. Doubtless the men and women in it had their love dreams turn into nightmares as often as elsewhere. But if they did they buried their secret in their hearts and stood by their bargains and tried to make the best of them.

Then one day the divorce microbe bit a banker, who had fallen in love with a neighbor's wife. It is as contagious as the flu. Not alone is it perennially epidemic in Hollywood. It sweeps over the whole country.

Of course, it is naive to imagine that divorce is a hereditary disease, but nevertheless, those families that do not have a long divorce record are not often the stuff from which stable marriages are made.

But, and this often happens, the men and women who have seen in their own families the misery that divorce brings, and the frustration

So I guess, after all, we had better leave it to the men. DOROTHY DIX.
