A MYSTERIOUS MESSAGE

There were times in her young and joyous life when Adele Castle scrutinized appearances with a lively and inquiring gaze and seriously asked herself whether the shadow of a mystery was not hanging over her father's head.

Outwardly, at least, Virgil Ellsworth Castle's life conformed to the standards that govern the conduct of cultured and affluent people. Although of medium stature, he looked quite distinguished. He had fine features and carried himself with an air. His tastes were excellent and he possessed a natural polish of manners. Though 50, he danced well, could swing a golf club expertly and he knew how to tell a story effectively. He was fond of high-flavored cigars, liked to wear a flower in his buttonhole and he adored his daughter.

Adele, being of a generation whose idols are rarely accepted on faith, wondered about him at times. She wondered rather hopefully, for in the eyes of youth there is an added fascination about a man who harbors a mystery. She was wondering about him this morning as she faced him across the breakfast table with its gleam of linen and its sparkle of old silver.

Fresh and lovely she looked in her pale-blue negligee, her face attractively tanned from a month of tennis and swimming and social whirls at a fashionable watering place in Maine, the slender line of her neck curving into a small, determined chin, her hair, the color of blueberries in hazy sunlight, snuggled close to her face like folded raven wings.

As was his habit, Virgil Ellsworth Castle was consuming the morning's news along with his eggs, toast and coffee.

"I see there is to be another expedition to the North Pole," he observed.

"Splendid!" said Adele, and her keen dark-brown eyes seemed to say that life was so gorgeous and intriguing an affair when one was only 20. "The world is getting so stuffy. We need more breathing space."

IT'S FRESH and it's CLEAN

THE HEADLINE

Mr. Castle looked embarrassed. As if to hide his expression, he puffed a big cloud of smoke from his cigar. "You have been talking about the north pole and Mexico and The Pica-roon," Adele pursued, "and all the the headlines in your newspaper clear across the table. There's one headline you haven't said anything about, although you have mentioned most of the others. finger on. It's the way you look sometimes and the little things you do and say—but mostly the things you don't say. Don't deny it, you old fraud, because I have been watching you. People sometimes talk to hide their thoughts, don't they! That's what you have been doing this morning."

a mystery, dim and rather alluring. But now she glimpsed the dark outlines of a tragedy, and it made her afraid.

"Tell me, dad," she said softly. "Something worrying you. What is it?"

He looked at her fresh, eager face across the table, nothing the sensitive nostrils, the vital curve of the mouth, the firm little chin, the robust, captivating loveliness of her. She was a strange mixture, this exquisite daughter of his—a commingling of modern sophistication and the tender and wholesome sentiments of another generation. The sight of her was a stimulant. The smile he gave her was one of sheer affection and pride.

"There, now. That's enough of that. You must put those absurd notions out of your head. It's nothing, really. I have only been working a little harder than usual. A certain financial difficulty arose—something that—But it's practically over now. It will be happily settled in a little while. Dear me! A quarter after 9! I must go."

She fixed him with a keen, level, doubting gaze. She reached across the table, picked up the newspaper, and reading the prominent caption in the upper left-hand corner:

POLICE STILL IN PURSUIT OF THE MYSTERIOUS MR. GRAVES

Headquarters Reported to Have Discovered Fresh Clues Which May Lead to Arrest of Elusive Swindler

WHO IS MR. GRAVES

She lifted her troubled gaze from the paper and looked at her father. Mr. Castle, who ruled his downtown office with the stern discipline of an autocrat, winced slightly beneath that steady, searching gaze. The indulgent smile with which he tried to mask his uneasiness was not wholly successful.

"Who is the Mysterious Mr. Graves, dad? I didn't read the papers while I was away."

Her father had risen and stood with one hand resting on the chair. "Mr. Graves? Oh, nobody in particular. It's only a name, just as the Pica-roon is only a name. Nobody knows who the man is."

"You are not very lucid, dad." "Well, you have probably heard of Daniel Forester's operations. He cleaned up ten millions in ten months. It was the grossest kind of swindle. Forester is dead now, but the police are still looking for a certain individual who is supposed to have been his partner. His true name isn't known, but somehow he has come to be designated as the 'mysterious Mr. Graves. That's all there is to it."

"All dad?" "All that really matters. I doubt whether the mysterious Mr. Graves will ever be found."

"But the newspaper says the police have discovered fresh clues."

"Newspaper gossip," said Mr. Castle contemptuously. He deposited his
