CARPO'S CHOICE.

T'was said, wherever Carpo went
A quarrel kept him company;
Till so, each peaceful wife would vent
Again an old delinquency;
Oft half forgot till he came in,
But then how well remembered it,
When every lurking ache would win
To start the ancient argument.

Unknown just how, but joining in
He'd fan the flame of fury's fire.
Some called him names as black as sin,
Some almost faced a jury's ire:
Ere came the time, that comes to all,
When Carpo moved from ways of men.
Upon this old terrestrial ball
How few were left to mourn him then.

Said William's Donald, "Flesh is heir
To many a weakness never doubt,
But digging here is layin' bare
Some thoughts I'd rather do without;
Aye, thoughts in which I take no pride;
So hopin here he'll lie in peace,
And may it long with us abide.
Who now from Carpo have release."

"Look out" said Duncan's Angus then,
"You have'nt got him buried yet,"
"Och man, he'll trouble none again,
Don't try to keep me worrit yet."
"Maybe, but yet if sperit lives
He'll find a way of startin' it.
'Tis sartin, joy to some it gives
To start the fight,—not partin' it."

And them the grave procession came
To Carpo's final resting place;
Where each a kindly honest name,
Of friendly memory could trace.
The parson drew to duty near,
The final words prepared to say
Consigning spirit to its sphere,
With clay consigning to its clay.

But Duncan's Angus held his breath
And tried to push his doubts away,
Grew silent near to thoughts of death
And not a word was his to say:
Or, not until an awful din,
A wild commotion crashed the air,
Two dogs were fighting, more joined in
With naked fang and flying hair,

"Och, one is missin" Angus spoke;
While meas'ring with appraising eyes,
As laid about with cuff and stroke
'He'd join you but he cannot rise:
'Tis sweet the tune you play the day"—
As pried a fighting canine loose,
To boot it howling that' he'd choose."

Lobsters Net 14 Cents Per Pound

(C. P. by Guardian's Special Wire)
YARMOUTH, N. S., Dec. 7—Nova Scotia lobster fishermen, relieved that the easterly gale over the week end had passed without damaging their equipment, watched the glass anxiously tonight as a westerly gale threatened.

A shipment of 667 crates was made to Boston tonight aboard the steamship Evangeline, bringing the total shipped since the season opened to 1,364 crates, with a gross return of approximately $36,000.

Fishing conditions continued favorable and the price average was 14 cents per pound. A price war at Clark's Harbor between rival buyers was responsible for a two-cent per pound rise in prices paid fishermen.

HEALTH

A HEALTH SERVICE OF THE CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION AND LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES IN CANADA

RHEUMATIC FEVER

Acute rheumatism also called rheumatic fever occurs most frequently during early adult life. It is characterised by swelling and inflamation of joints, and not infrequently by inflamation of the lining of the heart.

That it is caused by a germ has been established by recovery of the germ from the fluid of an inflamed joint. The disease is more common in males than females because exposure to wet and cold and sudden changes of temperature to which workmen are exposed in much greater numbers than are women have been found to be very important underlying causes. It would appear that body resistance is lowered by dampness and cold allowing the germs to gain a hold upon the system. Those who work outside, as well as bakers, iron workers and others exposed to sudden changes of temperature should take precautions to avoid getting chilled.

The onset of disease is characterized by a feeling of prostration, fever, much sweating, and pains in the joints especially affecting the arms and legs.

The pulse is rapid and bounding, the tongue moist and coated and the patient quickly loses appetite and develops a great thirst. The affected joints, frequently knees, elbows, ankles, wrists and hands are swollen, red, tender to touch, and extremely painful. Nausea may also be a disturbing factor and constipation is practically always present.

But more important perhaps than the troublesome symptom described is the damage to the lining of the heart which occurs in about 50 per cent of cases.

A person suffering from rheumatic fever should be kept in bed and made to remain absolutely at rest to avoid any strain being placed on the heart. The acute stage lasts from ten to twenty days but there is great danger of relapse if proper care is not taken.

The painful joints should be kept wrapped preferably in flannel. A nightgown - split down the front- permits of sponging and drying the body with the least amount of disturbance to the patient.

Liniments and drugs which control pain will alleviate the distress while absolute rest will help the heart to recover from inflamation which may have attacked it. Under medical and nursing care recovery may be looked for but without proper care the results may be disastrous.

Questions concerning health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered personally by letter.

LOOK GLAMOROUS IN THE EVENING

Any time's dancing time from now on. In town or village, wherever you are, you want to look lovely in someone's eyes, so choose your dance frock in brighter shades than those you ordinarily wear. Color always loses its depth under bright artificial lights.

Flowers are much to the fore in decorating simply cut dresses. The larger the better. Sprays of flowers extend from the shoulder to the waist. If the garniture is centred, four to six large blooms made of lame, sequins or velvet are utilised.

Hair ornaments have gone gay, and add extra sparkle to a pretty dance frock. One idea is a sequin butterfly, another a band of tightly twisted ribbon and flowers. Then we come to the question of jewellery. Pices set with colored stones are popular, and necklace, earings and braclets should contrast in color to your dress. You'll find plenty of choice.

A gold or silver bag and matching shoes is the most economical choice if you want them to go with more than one frock, but this season you will find there are imitation petit point, velvet and sequin bags to tempt you.

ECHOES

An echo is very interesting when you know that it is an echo, but some people, unaware of the cause, have been very much annoyed when they have heard themselves mimicked, so to speak. Addison tells of an echo near Milan which repeated a pistol shot fifty-six times, and if it returend the sound of a voice in the same way the speaker who did not know of it would conclude that a crowd was imitating him.

The Lakes of Killarney provide pleasure in this way apart from their exquisite scenery. The firing of a gun, for instance, causes such protracted reverberations comparable almost to a peal of thunder, while the sounding of a bugle produces an effect both novel and enchanting. Naturally, the best places for obtaining these results have been determined by experiment.

Similarly, an echo in a square in Cassel repeated a sound six times, but when the French erected a statue to Napoleon in the centre it became silent. Shortly afterwards this monument was destroyed and a lamppost put in its place, and the echo returned.

A remarkable echo on the Rhine, near Lurley, had a legend connected with it, in which a beautiful nymph was associated; and the writer was told of another interesting echo in that velinity, but he was not allowed to test it, as that privilege was only granted to certain individuals.
