men such as they had never experienced before. The people of this province lived in such close contact with the sea that they were familiar with the aftermath of every storm; they knew that the sea did not fall back again into the quietness it once had. It was exactly the same with human feelings throughout the world today, and it would take some time before life regained the placidity which it formerly enjoyed.

One thing should be clearly understood whenever the questions of public importance were discussed, said Mr. King, and that was the fact that people should learn to be patient with the great movements which they saw demonstrating themselves throughout the country and which were evidences of a revived aspiration and energy on the part of the people.

There were, he continued, three great movements in Canada at the present time, namely, the great agrarian movement as seen in the west, in which the farmers were going to the front; the labor movement in industrial centres, in which labor was evincing a desire for larver freedom; and thirdly, the great movement emanating from the men returned from overseas, who, having fought for a higher civilization, wanted to see it realized in our midst. In these movements he saw evidences of a revival of liberalism throughout the country and he welcomed them, because, bespeaking an aroused conscience on the part of the people, they gave promise of better government as a consequence.

Mr. King then proceeded to deal with the three movements stated. The farmers' movement in the West, he said, was perfectly natural, it was inevitable once reciprocity was entered, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier had prophesied that unless the farmers of the country had been given the markets which were available for their products they would consolidate in a determined effort to win what was denied them. He therefore claimed that the farmers' movement in the West was a fulfillment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's prediction. He advocated reciprocity in natural products and stated that the Liberal party stood for such a policy. He mentioned the recent election in Ontario and the overthrow of the Hewart Government as what he claimed to be an indication of a Liberal tendency on the part of the people of that province, and said that the farmers had resolved to unite particularly after the refusal of the Dominion Government in 1915 to receive a large rural deputa-tion that waited upon them in order to present their views to the administration. The had determined when the time came to show their resentment of such treatment and the Ontario election was the evidence of that sentiment.

Mr. King then proceeded to deal with the labor movement, and went on, sympathizing with this agrarian movement, and felt a like sympathy with the great mass of laborers—men and women—who worked in factories, on railways, and in shops, and those who spend their lives in mechanical labor of various kinds. There was one fault in the conditions of the nation, which he pointed out, and that was the fact that people failed to see in the lives of other conditions and aspirations similar to their own. Every class was inclined to think it was the only class that suffered any hardship and needed more of freedom and consideration; and so far as he had studied industrial problems he had observed that there was a great deal of industrial dispute mounting to anything which did not as a matter of fact arise out of the unwillingness of one man or group of men to give others a fair share of consideration. Liberalism meant giving all men the same consideration; and it was only natural to expect that the working classes of the country should like to have a larger share in shaping the conditions respecting their lives—the conditions in factories, shops, railroads, etc.

There were, said Mr. King, too many who saw co-operation was of no value in the success of industry, namely, labor, capital, the state and the community, and they should all receive due consideration.

Mr. Lapointe had moved in the House of Commons that the members of the country should be notified, out of their numbers, which were run up into thousands, and this was a good thing. He had had a good deal to do with railway organization and among the heads of the lines he had found that there was a great deal of ability and intelligence, but they were not being used to their full advantage. He had found that the men who had been conserved should go out not merely in equal measure to their brothers and mothers who had lost boys and their brothers. He thought that the War Veterans were wise in forming their organization which they had established. It was the duty of the Government, he said, to give the most careful consideration to whatever legitimate demands might be made on behalf of those who had played their part in the war.

Mr. King then went on to say that there was a universal desire for change, and in every part of the world men were showing a tendency to substitute new institutions for long-established ones, and there was a danger in going too far in that direction.

He viewed with some concern the tendency which was asserted on the part of some to have government change from one of great stability through the maintenance of strong progressive parties, to one of relative instability through the growing up of different groups each trying to get control for itself. The question that must be faced was whether or not we should look for government to any single group of interests, or look to the party system and broad enough to embrace all the classes comprising the nation. It was the work of Liberalism to serve these various interests and to bring them into harmonious co-operation. The form of government which this party advocated at that time laid down by a British statesman, of the reign of Charles the First—that which divided every part and member of the government since Confederation, there would be a condition as "last days of Cromwell and the last state would be worse than the first." The common welfare must be the object of true government and this the Liberal party stood for.

Mr. King then contrasted the broad principles of Liberalism and Conservatism as he conceived them—the former as the embodiment of progress and freedom, the latter the opponent of change and the protagonist of privileged interests.

The Liberal party, said Mr. King, advocated and stood for a policy of tariff reduction along the lines of farm and other implements of production, and in footwear, cloth and iron; and was prepared to increase the preference in favor of Great Britain from 33-1/3 per cent to 50 per cent.

There is a strong feeling, he said in regard to the Returned Soldiers' movement, that things should come back to the way they were.

At the time he said was there greater need of a strong government in Canada and yet the country, he lamented, has the weakest government since Confederation. For the last two years the country has been staggering between two parties the ship of state swept back and forth by storms.

There is a strong feeling, he said in regard to the Returned Soldiers' movement, that things should come back to the way they were.

Liberal representative of Quebec

East," and "who," said Mr. Rattenbury, "is justly regarded as one of the best public speakers in Canada."

Mr. LaPointe was received with applause as he made his appearance.

He first gave a short address in French which he spoke with the pleasing fluency of those only who have mastered language at their full command. His remarks in his native tongue evidently fell on receptive ears and were punctuated by frequent applause.

Mr. LaPointe began his address by conveying his hearty thanks for the reception accorded his leader and himself and for the kind remarks of the chairman. He declared that he was very glad to have been accompanied by his leader, Hon. Mr. King to Prince Edward Island. "I have learned something," said he, "since I reached your island yesterday. I thought that we had reached the record for hospitality but I find there are others."

He expressed himself as glad to get acquainted with this province, which gave birth to Confederation, and while not the largest place it could give lessons to all races and classes along the lines of unity.

Mr. LaPointe is a pleasing speaker. He has the happy gift of humor and it was his apt manner of using bright phrases which won him what measure of applause came his way last night.

FIUME TO BE ITALIAN PORT

(Special to The Guardian.) LONDON, Jan. 14.—The "Big Three" has decided Fiume shall be an Italian port under the League of Nations, a Paris despatch to the knows the needs of the people of Canada, having made a thorough study of the problems which face the Canadian people today. Upon his shoulders has fallen the mantle of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, than whom said he, no greater Canadian has ever lived and who from his grave is still the leader of the Canadian people, whose lessons would never be forgotten.

Mr. King, he declared to be broad minded and worthy to be the successor of the great man who is gone. He is a good Liberal said he, and added "so am I."

Mr. LaPointe put up a strong plea for party politics, declaring Liberalism to be the only panacea to soothe the ills which beset the country.

Parties, he added in the next breath are only means to an end, and country must be first.

He censured those who styled themselves as Independents and threw some hot shot at the head of Sir Robert Borden who for some reason or other was slavishly supported by his followers, though why no Liberal could understand.

You remember the title question, said Mr. LaPointe. Most of the members supported the resolution in regard to abolishing knight-hoods, etc. Yet at the end of the debate Sir Robert told Parliament a man who was prevented from giving titles to his friends he would resign and go home and they took him at his word and swallowed their opinions.

Mr. King went on to say that the present parliament does not represent the people and the ministers are ashamed to look the people in the face. They said it was a war of parliament. Well, they were demobilized every thing else; let them now demobilize themselves. (Laughter.)

This present parliament he went on, is no more a representative parliament than a smuggler is a free trader.

He pointed that there was any desire in the country to invite all parties and conduct affairs of state as a solid whole, and challenged the Government to go to the people. "The present worn out government," said he, "has no right to speak the word for Canada or pledge our future." Canadian polls etc. he added must be decided in Ottawa and nowhere else, Canada is a nation and must not be allowed to go back to the status of a province. We all love our country—there is no finer, but the cheap politician can't talk of it without wrapping himself in the British flag.

This country has always suffered by "the-waving he went on, and when they start then we get suspicious that someone is trying to steal something.

Liberalism, he claimed to be coming into its own in Canada. The country he said must be settled by people of various races and creeds who must be dealt with in a spirit of moderation and charity.

Mr. LaPointe said he was proud of his race and origin and proud of being a Canadian.

TEN WERE KILLED.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—Ten dead had been brought into the Court of Reichstag Building when the National Assembly adjourned at five o'clock this afternoon, according to an announcement made by President Ebert.

Mr. King next dealt with the allied movement in his 1918-1919 class in the House of Commons. "If there is one class in the world of society which is more deserving of consideration than another, it is the class of the state to give, it is that great body of men which is conserved," he said. "Conservation should go out not merely to the men who had come back in equal measure to their brothers and mothers who had lost boys and their brothers. He thought that the War Veterans were wise in forming their organization which they had established. It was the duty of the Government, he said, to give the most careful consideration to whatever legitimate demands might be made on behalf of those who had played their part in the war."
