Mr. de Valera and Mr. Dulanty, High Commissioner in London, picture here arriving at Downing street where they signed the new England-Eire agreement.

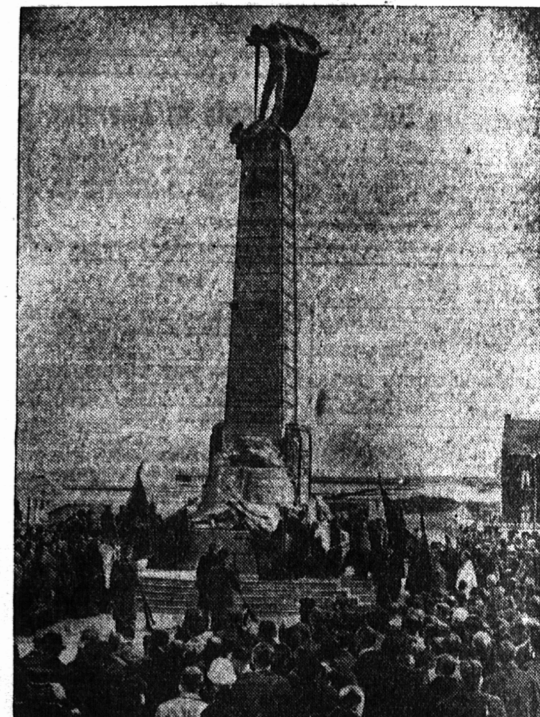

During his visit to Boston recently Cardinal Villeneuve, spiritual leader of Canadian Roman Catholics, was presented with the palm of the French Academy by the French consul there, as one of nine cited for bringing honor to French on this continent, somewhat disturbed are the congregation of the Methodist church at Springfield, Vermont. Their minister, Rev. Lawrence Larowe (Centre) engaged a substitute to preach while he went to fish on the trout season's opening day. Church trustees debating if he really spent a "Christian Sunday" as he claims, decided he did and voted to start services earlier all summer, so everyone can fish. Despite effort of Hitler and Mussolini to make a strong military alliance, that which resulted from recent Anglo-French conversations is considered the strongest of all time. Premier Edouard Daladier (Right Front) and his foreign minister, George Bonnet, went to Downing St. to plan it.

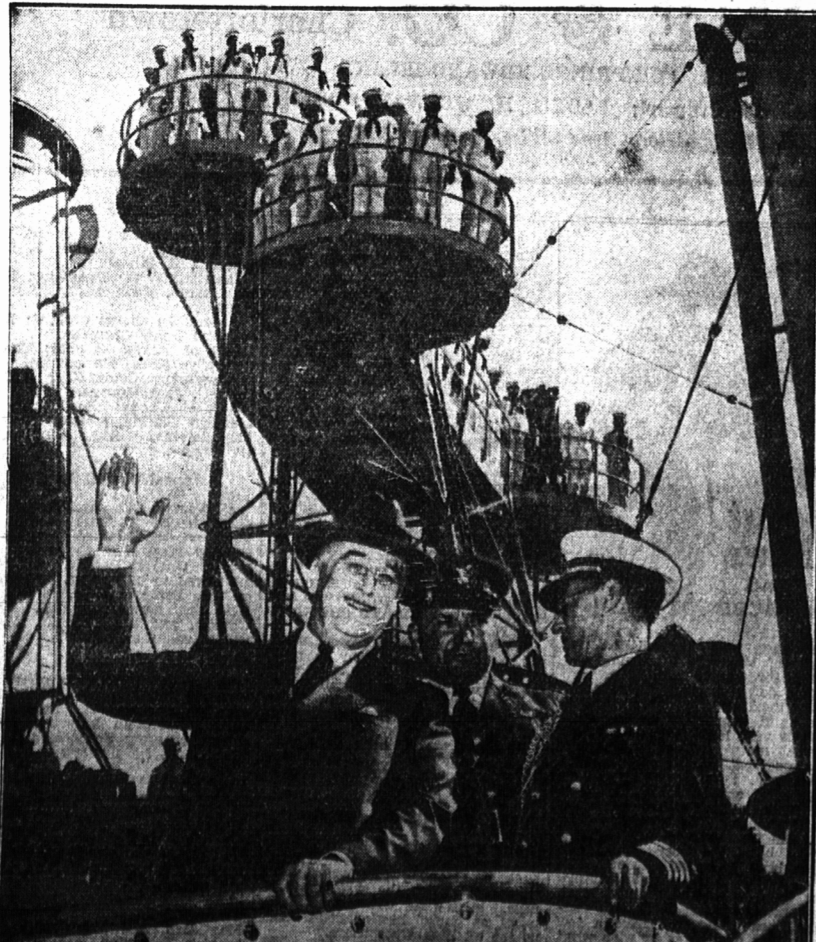

A few years ago scenes like this picture above would have been impossible, but times change and here you see Premier de Valera of Eire being cheered by London crowds. The occasion was the signing of the new agreement between England and Eire in London.

Active in all the ceremonies which marked the wedding of their brother, King Zog of Albania, were the Princesses Myzeen, Ruhljo and Maxhide (Left to Right). They put on their best military uniforms to attend the army review in Tirana, which was a feature of the celebrations.

A general view of the ceremony at the St. George Memorial at Zeebrugge, Belgium, recently, when British, French, Belgian and Italian ex-servicemen took part in services which commemorated the famous British attack of 20 years ago.

Vacationing on the Atlantic is President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who picked the new U.S. cruiser Philadelphia as a resting spot. Plans called for at least a week's fishing. The president was also to have the opportunity to see the latest development in naval armament while aboard the warship. His interest in it was believed evidenced by pressure his Washington supporters were bringing to bear on congress to speed up action on his proposed $1,150,000,000 naval expansion plan. Before he left the White House, April 25, he sent up a naval budget totalling $185,000,000. While sailors lined every vantage point, crowds at Charleston, S. C., received this wave in return for their farewells.

In aid of a fund to provide guide dogs for the blind, the White City Kennel association held a dog show at London's White City Stadium a few days ago. Visitors found "Sandringham Sparkle," a Cumber spaniel, one of the show's most interesting. The spaniel was one of several bred by the late King George V, who was always an ardent dog fancier as his sons have proven to be. "Sandringham Sparkle" was shown by Commander E. Welman and E. Cape.

Paris fashion experts worked overtime to provide the trousseau for Queen Geraldine of Albania. Style scouts noted this far-trimmed coat with interest when she and the King reviewed the army. As the troops marched by their new queen greeted them with the Albanian national salute.
