THE FARM
Chapter 15

Three days later, Dora found herself mistress of the farmhouse. It meant complete isolation and it meant the hardest sort of work.

Her father said they would spend the first two or three days making things "ship shape."

"I'll make fires in all the rooms to dry out the dampness," she said, "and I'll do the heavy cleaning. You had Maude wash!" came, "This night take 100 pounds or so from her weight."

Dora laughed a little at his ill-natured joke. She went through her tasks with a swift efficiency that would have astonished Aunt Maude had she been there to see it. Dora could always work well alone, it was only when she was under criticism that she became confused and lost her self-confidence.

She stood at the end of the day outside the kitchen door, too tired to raise her voice and call in her father and the other hired man to supper. She had cleaned windows, washed hundreds of dishes, untouched all winter, polished the stove, scrubbed floors, and in addition cooked dinner for three men and supper for two. Uncle Peter had gone back to town for the night.

The work went by as the first day had begun. At least she was so tired at night that she fell asleep as soon as she reached the bed. Sunday, rather wishing she could see a few different faces again she thought of driving to the church. But Aunt Maude had not suggested that she appear for dinner and she hated to force herself upon the family. She felt as timid with them as with strangers.

"I'll show you the play house. I wish Aunt Maude would let father and me live there, but she says it costs too much to repair the roof." Dora answered and led the way toward the fields back of the farm house.

Beyond the barn partly hidden by it, was a quaint little building of blue gray stone. "They hauled it from the quarry at Knob Hill," Dora told Morton, minus its windows and part of its roof. It was four rooms big—two downstairs two above. Here and there plaster was of five laths, shutters kept out some of the light and rain from the windows, the floors were of thick pine boards gook for a century more.

"We played here at keeping house when we were kids," Dora went on, pushing open the door. Inside was a most curious lot of odds and ends. Two hooded cradles sat on a table, a gigantic soap dish minus its lid, with a great design of flowers in pink lustre, sat in a doorless cupboard. Chairs with parts of backs, tables often without one of the legs, four poster beds taken apart and lying on the floor spinning wheels, old looms wood carding machines, rag rags and samplers were all mixed in with discarded kitchen chairs, rickety farm tools and odds and ends of all sorts of junk.

"I like this old furniture," Dora said, unconscious of the part this furniture was to play in her life later on. "Most of this was owned by great great grandma Nicholson, who built this house."

J. B. MILLMAN.

But after dinner, simply to feel respectable again, she started on her first walk and the dust on her feet, though the ground was wet and slimy as the sun drew out the frost and going out the door she met Morton coming up the path. He had ridden out, his horse's legs were coated with mud.

"How—why I didn't expect you! I'm so glad to see you!" Dora greeted him, and then felt afraid of the enthusiasm of her greeting. She had forgotten herself in her joy at seeing him and spoke without thinking.

"That's good," he greeted Jim, who led his horse to the stable and, who, poor man, knowing no other way to express his own appreciation of this visit to his daughter, spent an hour washing and rubbing down the visitor's horse.

The young couple wandered around the farm. Morton had never been there before.

Part of the house is old, the wooden wing Aunt Maude built when she married," Dora explained. The house was white washed stone, low and generous in its lines. The roof and eaves were painted white to match but its little windows give an air of stingsiness of the older part. A half acre of land ran to the road neatly bordered with a "pale fence" now being white washed by Jim, which enclosed Aunt Maude's garden. These fancy shaped flower beds and two tall maple trees for shade one at each end of the lawn. A porch ran the length of the house the whole effect was plain and comfortable. The entrance drive for visitors or farm wagons ran up the left of the lawn, outside the fence, and led to an irregular collection of out buildings—a gigantic barn, a big silo, a carriage house and a building for storing tools, pigsties at the other end and a large chicken house and yard.

"One of the best kept farms about here," Morton said as they walked aimlessly about. "And a peach of a house."
