Gen. Niente's Military Junta Ousted From Ecuador

Administration of Provisional President Juan Niente Comes to Abrupt End

Ministers Flee By Plane

QUITO, ECUADOR, Sept. 5 (AP)—The power of the military junta which for the past year has been ruling this republic with a hand of iron was broken suddenly and dramatically today when picked troops of the president's palace revolted in favor of the Constitutional government headed by Senor Augusto B. Herrera.

No fighting took place but scenes of wild enthusiasm reigned in the streets of this picturesque capital as General Niente and his cabinet hurriedly departed in a huge transport plane for a destination, which though unknown, is thought to be Bogota, Colombia. Accompanying were General Tomas Hernandez, Minister of War, Colonel Luis Vargas, Minister of Finance, Colonel Rodrigo Ulloa, Minister of Interior and Public Works and several lesser functionaries. Many of the fugitives were accompanied by their wives and children.

Widespread Corruption Censured
 "General Niente's fight marks the end of a period of corruption and oppression unparalleled in the history of this country," declared Senor Brun in a manifesto from the president's palace. "One of our first steps will be to abrogate the unequal treaties and outrageous concessions granted by our predecessors in office."

Upon receipt of news of the sweeping Constitutional victory in Quito, Ecuadorian security forces staged a sharp rally towards the close of business on Wall Street today.

An official of the State Department today pointed out in a guarded statement that the United States had never extended full recognition to General Juan Niente's government.

Mystery Story At The Capitol

A thrilling mystery, whose pivotal motive for murder is the wealth of a multi-millionaire oil man and the identity of two girls who claim to be the rightful heirs to her fortune, is the story of "The Case of the Stuttering Bishop." It opens today at the Capitol Theatre.

Perry Mason, in the person of Donald Woods, is the brilliant lawyer-detective who once again gets a chance to combine his legal ability with his penchant for unravelling a mass of circumstantial evidence, pointing to no less than six highly possible suspects, of whom the stuttering bishop, played by Edward McWade, is one.

The locale of the story shifts interestingly from a third-class hotel room to a mansion on Park Avenue, a pier on the river front in the dead of night, and finally to the deck of an ocean liner.

Ann Dvorak plays Della Street, who as Mason's secretary is of incalculable help to her lawyer-detective employer.

Others in the cast include Helen Mackellar, Joseph Graham, Linda Perry, Tom Kennedy, Craig Reynolds, Gordon Oliver, Gordon Hart, Anne Nagel, Veda Ann Borg and Mrs. McKinney.

"CHRONIC APPENDICITIS" SYMPTOMS MAY BE DUE TO OTHER CONDITIONS

When pain is present in the region of the appendix and there are no symptoms of kidney stones in men and women or of trouble in the ovaries in women, the cause of the pain may be believed to be due to a chronic appendix. The physician may advise operation to remove the appendix or just the daily use of paraffin oil to keep the wastes in the large intestine well lubricated so that they will readily pass from the bowel.

Sometimes, also, the patient has already had the appendix removed and still has pain in the region. In these cases the pain is believed due to adhesions (two raw surfaces having got stuck together following the operation). This is likewise treated by the use of a desiccated paraffin oil daily, unless operation to break up the adhesions is thought advisable.

That the pain in the appendix region which is so often called chronic appendicitis may be due to other conditions is now receiving careful thought by physicians and surgeons. Many of these have not had an X-ray examination, often because the physician did not consider it necessary or was trying to save the patient the expense.

Dr. Maurice Feldman, Baltimore, in Radiology, reports an X-ray study of 115 operations at the University of Maryland Hospital for so-called chronic appendicitis. These operations revealed that in a large proportion of cases the pain in the appendix region was due to some other trouble. "In the 115 cases there were 36.5 percent peptic ulcer (ulcer of the

Letter Of Sympathy

The following letter has been received by Bro. Ewen D. MacKinnon and family, Canoe Cove, from Derry, L. O. L.:

Dear Bro. MacKinnon—

In the passing of your beloved partner there is left a vacant chair in your home circle and loneliness in your heart for one who has been with you for sixty years.

We, your brethren of Derry Lodge, realizing this desire to convey to you our heartfelt sympathy in this your time of bereavement and sorrow. We know that any words of ours however sincere are but poor consolation to you in your sorrow. But we commend you to the care of the all wise Master Divine, who knows and cares for all who heed our sorrows and leaves only the cherished memory of the loved one gone on before.

A few short years of evil past, We reach the happy shore; Where death divided friends at least Shall meet to part no more.

Alenby's smile conveyed an apology. "The whole thing looks good to me, too, but before I subscribe my share, I'm going to sleep on it. It's an old family custom which we Alenbys have never discarded."

"It's quite all right," Ward said and frowned when Grafton half turned to urge an immediate signing of the agreement. "I've signed a certified cheque for a hundred thousand. It's all I've got," he confessed with a wry smile. "Well, Barney? How do you like it?"

"Here I am," said the host blotting his signature. "And my cheque—"

Sir George learned forward, eyes gleam again. "I presume you will have it certified?"

"Of course," Grafton blinked. "Tomorrow when the bank opens—"

"And now suppose we forget all about this and go for a swim," Alenby suggested. "A little salt water will wash away many millions of figs."

"Small idea," Ward agreed. "Come on, let's route out the girls. You coming, Sir George?"

"Capital idea. But let's not make it too late," Pakenham begged. "I've got a special batch of lobster. To get ourselves in the proper mood for Gombey dancing, I've ordered some music down from Hamilton."

With the strain of the conference added to his additional worry, Alenby found it marvelous to relax and sun himself on Treasure Cove's clean, pinkish sand. Around four o'clock Parker brought down a tea basket, and at Barney's suggestion a thermos of cocktails. After a dividend, Cora Sue and Kathleen rounded up the girls and Grafton, a successful effort to join in. Only Barbara and Grafton sat aside talking to Alenby and somewhat moodily watching the usual horseplay upon the beach.

Grafton came up dripping after a hard swim out to a reef. "For heaven's sake, Barbie, can't you help up and be one of the party? Here, drink this." He held out an enormous double cocktail.

Barbara shook her head. "Drink it!" rasped the master of Freeboots' Hall and for a moment Alenby glimpsed the Earl of Grafton who had baffled his way upwards regardless of natural and human obstacles.

Although color swept into her face, Barbara obeyed and she soon joined in the conversation with such animation that Alenby was very busy to catch several candid shots of her; then, at random, he snapped some of the guests in various poses.

Sir George, obviously relieved to have the business done, avoided Barbara's vicinity, but, revealed a whimsical brand of humor which earned him Kathleen's throaty laughter and ravishing glances from Cora Sue's wide blue eyes.

"Ah bet you killed over so many lions and tigers," gurgled the latter. "Oh, you men are so lucky! You can come and go as you please."

"I'd feel satisfied to make half as successful a man as you do a shark," Sir George chuckled. "Besides, shooting lions and tigers isn't so much fun when you've got to get into the bush on foot to stop their munching off your expensively imported labor. Remember, one old man-eater up near Mysore had to be got around to making up some music down from Hamilton."

Though Beggs' opinion came in to a dog, a goat or even a calf. "How did you get him then?" Kathleen demanded, bright lips intriguingly parted.

Sir George's look met and engaged hers as he said gravely, "I built a machan—sort of a snipe's post in a tree, you know. Then we looked about and picked the fairest maiden from all the village and staked her out!"

"You didn't!" Kathleen gasped. "How awful!"

"Wasn't it? Only trouble was we shot the local rajah who was stalking her instead of the tiger."

Screaming, the girls pursued Sir George down the beach amid bursts of laughter, and when the party returned to Freeboots' Hall in order to dress, it seemed incredible that anything save happiness and good nature ruled this lovely coral island.

Alenby, however, made a pretext for detouring around to the slave quarters where, to his relief, he found Creepy. The boatman proved extremely sullen and morose even when Alenby said,

"Glad they didn't detain you in town, Creepy. I've been looking forward to seeing you dance."

The boatman nodded darkly. "Dem Bobbies didn't have nothing on me. Dey let me go right straight off. Vih I knew for sure who put dead girl. Dem coppers aint done trying to get me and de boys in trouble."

In the late afternoon sunlight the hook nose and prominent cheekbones of Creepy's Indian forebears became more plainly visible.

"By the way, Creepy, I hear you had good luck shooting last night. Yes, sir," he grunted. "Got three of dem. Would have gotten more maybe, but I was sleepy."

"What kind o' a rifle did you use?"

"A .22, sir. Belongs to Miss Gail. She lets me use it whenever I want."

"Is it a magnum?"

"That's a special make of .22 high power."

"Don't know, I expect de rifle is in de back hall where de general is. I got to go now and get de Dart ready for de trip over to Tom Moore Inn." Muttering to himself, the boatman glided off into the deepening sunset.

Oh the Camera Clues

Hmmm. So the rifle, presumably, was accessible to anyone who chose to use it? That made the evidence of the bullets of little value. Still, more than ever, Roger Alenby wished he knew who might have snaked out of Freeboots' Hall to send a bullet hissing through the window of his room.

He had started for the staircase when suddenly he recalled that newspapers Boyd had brought had accordingly detoured into the library. Once he had retrieved two copies of the Mid-Ocean and a two-day old copy of the West-Island Tribune from their hiding place he ran through them hurriedly.

It was in the New York paper he found what he was looking for, a news dispatch from South America. Once, twice, he read the item through, then clipped it out and stowed it away before he resumed his progress up the stairs.
