

Husband Had Boils

THICK POULTICE OF MECCA BROUGHT OUT PUS AND CORES

Completely Healed
No Sign of Scars.

Mrs. J. L. B., Toronto, writes:
"I want to tell you what Mecca means in our home. Three winters ago my husband had about twenty boils on his neck, also a very bad abscess on his leg above the knee. I completely healed him with Mecca Ointment. Thick applications of Mecca brought out the core and pus, then I applied thinly to heal. Mecca relieved pain and congestion and healed completely, without the sign of a scar. My home is never without it, because I use it on all infections, bruises, burns, etc. Mecca Ointment is sold by all Drug-gists—25c, 35c (Tube), 50c and $1.00.

The value of farm property in the United States in 1930 was $57,245,544,269, as compared with $77,923,651,599 in 1920.

Eye Comfort

for eye workers is a matter of vital importance.
From early morning to late at night we "crowd" our eyes relentlessly, from one job to another.
How long will they stand it? Are you now enjoying that efficiency and comfort which ought to be yours?
Consult us if you are not; You have much to gain, and nothing to lose.
In any case the knowledge gained from an examination, makes it well worth while.

SWEETVANITY

by RICHARD GOYNE

"Yes, it's up to the Black Band to absolve him. We've never let other people suffer our blame yet, and I know you would be against letting this slide, now. I've written this—notice for the weekly paper. I thought it the straight thing to do, and we can all sign it and clear those who are innocent."
He began to read ostentatiously from the paper in his hand, and Cynthia was so astonished at Dicky's sudden show of sporting spirit that she was helpless to put in a word edge-ways.

"WE, THE UNDERSIGNED," he chanted, "herely wish to express our intense regret at any embarrassment which may have been caused by our unexpected innovation at the dance following the Mayoral Reception in Midley on Tuesday night."
"In the light of what has since transpired, we wish most sincerely to apologise to those who suffered through our innocently-intended liv-ening up of the festivities, and to state that, had we foreseen the un-fortunate outcome implicating cer-tain people who were entirely be-yond responsibility, our plans would never have been carried into effect."

"Particularly," the notice con-cluded, "do we wish to emphasise the injustice of one rumour which has gained credit, affecting, as it does, one of the most prominent business men in this town. We, whose names are hereby appended, are alone directly or indirectly re-sponsible for anything which may have occurred."
He looked across at her, nervously.
"We can hardly mention his name. We could hardly say more or less." Cynthia smiled, cynically.
"I agree with you; and your sug-gestion in that we hold ourselves up to public ridicule and scorn for the sake of—"
He nodded.
"I have seen most of the others. It's a hard path but you'll sign, of course."
Cynthia did not care very much what she did, just then. She follow-ed him to a little writing table where pen, ink and blotting were to be found. The blotting paper, she hardly noticed, hid most of the typewritten apology under which she had signed her name with some relief. When it was over she was glad. No one could accuse her, now, of allowing Peter to be blamed for her escapades.
Dicky's cheeks were unusually flushed as he folded the paper and put it in his pocket.
"Now, Cynthia, there's another thing. You remember the play I was writing, the one we're going to per-form for the local hospital this season?"
"Well?"
"It is finished," he announced, triumphantly, "and I want you to hear it first. Come out for a drive tomorrow night, and we'll find some-where away from interruptions. You will be playing the lead, of course, so you won't refuse me this?"
She bit her lip, and it was chiefly the thought of Peter's possible wish to take her out the following night that caused her to consent. His re-lief was somewhat strangely marked as he took his leave, and his last look puzzled her. It was the expres-sion of a man who has achieved a great deal, whereas Cynthia could find no reason for his unusual elation.

Any distraction was welcome, however, just then. The play would be something to take up her mind, and beneath her pride, Cynthia felt afraid for the first time in her life. Afraid of the inevitable moment when she must face Peter again. What would he say, after her ex-hibition? An exhibition that had been inexcusable because it had proved such a failure in every way.
There was no word of any kind from him next day, however. Did she but know it, he too looked for-ward to their meeting with a feeling of embarrassment and apprehen-sion. Her impulsive folly had ash-amed him as much as it had herself, and therein was reflected the depths of his love.

Mr. Marland tackled him, during the day, about the scandal. Peter tried to put it off as something bad-ly exaggerated, but promised to come after dinner for a chat.
He was about to leave his office that evening—it was round about eight o'clock, for he had been busy with the accountants—when the late porter announced a caller.
"Mr. Richard Smythe, sir. Can you see him?"
Peter looked up from his desk with a surprised frown. Smythe was the last person he wished to see just then. He had a fairly good idea as to how much Dicky had been to blame for the Band's latest folly, and hardly trusted himself to see him.
But he thought of a weakness crushed it, and he rose, nodding.
"Show him in."

Dicky looked embarrassed, when he entered; even nervous. His in-tentions were apparently obvious from the beginning.

Floats For The Collection Of Oyster Spats

(By Dr. A. W. Needler, Biological Oyster Investigator.)
Floats have often been used in oyster culture—to support cultch for spat collection, for rearing oysters to a marketable size and for holding oysters during handling for the market. A form of float developed at the Prince Edward Island Marine Station, and its use for supporting shells in bags for spat collection, is presented.
The construction of the float can best be understood from the figure. The puncheons are oak molasses puncheons, such as are com-mon in the Maritime Provinces, and are cleaned, and painted with white lead and with copper. A hole is left for pumping and provided with a wooden plug. The frame, of planed and copped 2x6 spruce, fits over the puncheons—the cross-pieces being cut out to fit their curves, and the puncheons tied in with ropes.
The buoyancy of the floats is over three quarters of a ton, and when loaded, they are quite stable and can be walked on. About 65 wire bags of shells (about a bushel each) submerged the float to top-ward of the stringers. The bags are hung on spikes placed both inside and outside the stringers and on the cross-pieces.
The cost will vary locally. The price of puncheons is from $1.00 up according to demand. About 80 feet of lumber is used in the float. The most costly item is the copper paint.
Two such floats were used in the summer of 1932 and they suffered no apparent damage in two severe storms even when washed ashore owing to faulty mooring. No leakage occurred. It is expected that they will last several years.
The advantages of the floats for exposing shells in bags may be summarized as follows:
1—The cultch is exposed in the surface water layers where larvae ready to settle have been found most abundant in the Malpeque region. Better "sets" were obtained than on bags stoked along the shore just below low tide. By simple alterations the cultch could be hung at any depth.
2—The spat are protected from starfish which cause great damage when cultch rests on the bottom.
3—The cultch is protected from burying by wave wash. It remains more free from silt and none is lost by partial burying where the bags rest on the bottom.
4—The use of floats makes spat collection independent of the nature of the bottom.
5—The labour of placing the bags on the floats is less than that of
