The Wife Who Forgave But Continues to Nag Her Husband—One Woman's Solution of the Mother-in-Law Problem—Advice to Newlyweds

Dear Miss Dix—Some years ago during my early married life the combination of a California moon, Sierra atmosphere and the June wife of a December husband, together with my own weakness, caused me to fall from grace. I did wrong and am ready to take my medicine and have taken it in large doses ever since, because, although my wife forgave, she has never forgotten, and during tiffs she throws it up to me with an expertness born of years of practice.

I have become callous to it, but the children have ears and I am afraid that they will hear. Perhaps I don't deserve much consideration, though I have tried to be a good husband and father since my stumble.

Is there any cure for a wife who, in her angry moments, will disillusion her children as to their father's character?

Answer: It has always seemed to me that there is no other such poor sport in the world as the man or the woman who professes to forgive but who never forgets, who accepts the sinner and then reviles him or her for his or her sin.

There are men who will marry a woman whose skirts they know to be bespattered and then, continually throw up her past to her. There are women who will take back an erring husband and torture him the remainder of his life by forever nagging him about the false step he made.

Nothing could show a meaner or more ungenerous spirit, because the man did not have to marry the girl with the soiled garments and the wife could have shut her door on her unfaithful husband.

They voluntarily shrived their sinners, and when they did that they washed their slates clean and started a fresh score. They were in honor bound to blot out all of their offenses. And if they were not big enough souled to do this it would have been far better and kinder to let the black sheep go their own way in peace.

Certainly a wife is not only a poor sport who continually reminds her husband of a fault he has committed in the past, but she is a poor and shortsighted mother as well, for she can do her children no more deadly wrong than to injure their father's prestige in their eyes.

For there will surely come a time when she will find that her children are getting beyond her control, when they need a stronger hand than hers on the rein and a more experienced hand than hers to guide them. They will need a father who has seen more of life than their mother has, who knows the world better than their mother does; a father whose opinions have weight in their eyes that their mother's never have. But how shall she appeal for help to this father if she has taught her children to regard him as a man of no worth?

The woman who criticizes her husband to her children, or who calls children's attention to their father's faults is either a brainless idiot or else she is taking a fiendish revenge upon him, and in either case the children are the sufferers, because she takes away their father's influence from them, and that might save them in their hour of temptation.

Undoubtedly it is hard for a wife to forgive her husband for stumbling off the straight and narrow path, but in common fairness, if she does pretend to forgive him she should also forget, or at least she should keep silent and never mention it again.

Dear Miss Dix—I have solved the mother-in-law problem successfully, and this is the way I did it:

When my son married I told him that he must put his wife before me and think of her first. Although I am a widow and he was my only child, I refused to go to live with them. I never meddle in their affairs or give advice. I don't try to furnish their house, but let them fix it up to suit themselves. The result is that my daughter-in-law loves me and I am a welcome guest whenever I go to visit them. What do you think of this plan?

I think your middle name is Mrs. Solomon and that your plan for getting along with in-laws will always work. It contains all of the law and prophets about how to get along with a daughter-in-law or a son-in-law.

And mother has only to apply the Golden Rule to her daughter-in-law and treat her as she would have liked to have been treated when she was a daughter-in-law in order to get along with her and win her heart. And the wonder is that so few women have sense enough to try this plan.

For no woman ever gets so old that she doesn't remember her bridal days and how she thought and felt when she was a bride. She remembers that as she worked the monograms and embroidered the linen for her hope chest she stitched in the dreams of a little home for two in which she would be sole mistress and which she would run as she chose and where she would use her best things every day if she wanted to.

She remembers how, when she was first married, she wanted to be alone with her husband without any third party about. She remembers how cocksure she was of herself and how she resented all interference and advice. And she remembers how she hated her mother-in-law for always acting as if her husband was a poor martyr every time she asked him to do anything, and how jealous she was of his mother's influence over him, and how mad it used to make her when her mother-in-law snoped in the garbage can and asked her if she didn't think she was peeling the potatoes too thick.

Oh, any mother-in-law can get along with any daughter-in-law if she will follow your advice and mind her own business and let daughter-in-law mind hers and if she will keep her own house and only visit instead of being a permanent incubance.

Dear Dorothy Dix—In your discussion of women working after marriage it seems to me you overlook one salient point. That is the formation of habits which require two incomes. Then if the wife's employment is terminated by maternity the couple must face increased expense and decreased income.

My solution was to permit my wife to continue her employment on condition that every cent of her salary be invested in her name. The arrangement did not last long, but it gave her a taste for seeing the dividend come in, and each year has increased her investment.

Answer: This is such a wise suggestion that I hope many of the young married couples who are starting out together in a working partnership as well as a sentimental one will adopt it. There is no doubt that one of the main causes of domestic discord comes from young married people trying to support a champagne style of living on a beer income.

THE HEALTHY SKIN PERSPIRES

The skin is not merely a protective covering for the body, as some people suppose, but an organ just as truly as are the heart, the kidneys or the lungs. And it is the most hard working organ in the body, for it produces oil, sweat, hair and nails; absorbs, throws off wastes, breathes and regulates the temperature of the body.

The sweat glands, located in the true skin, under the epidermis, do the important work of throwing off waste and water through perspiration. Of course, individuals differ as much in the characteristics of these glands as in every other.

Some people perspire freely in summer, others in winter. With some, excessive perspiration is confined to certain regions; with others the whole skin is affected. But a certain amount of perspiration is absolutely necessary as all seasons for a healthy body.

As much as two pounds of perspiration may be lost in a day.

and going to places of amusement find it very hard to adjust themselves to the style of living made necessary by their husbands' salaries. They miss the pretty frocks they were accustomed to and the money in their purses.

It is fatally easy to acquire luxurious habits and cruelly hard to break them, so it is certainly wise for any young couple not to start out on a scale of expenditure that they might not be able to keep up. And doubly wise is it to begin saving, for thrift is also a habit, and little as most young people realize it, it is quite as much fun to save as it is to spend, and there are few occupations more agreeable than watching a bank account grow.
