WHY I PAINT A GARDEN

By Wm. Bleasdale Cameron ... Why does anybody paint a garden? Perhaps the chief reason is this: What differentiates man from the beasts mainly is intellect.

Squirrels store nuts against the coming winter; bees, honey; muskrats and beavers, bark and grass. The animals and insects show a measure of intelligence, providing for their future.

And here is a significant thing. Growing things is a form of evolution. All of us, we may suppose, even the scolding, acknowledge a Creator. It is impossible to imagine anything creating itself - to conceive of a man developing from nothing. To start growth, we must have a germ, X, as we are told in some of the best books, man is made in the image of the Creator, then he doubtless partakes in the degree of the nature of that Creator. Hence his desire to himself create.

The artist the mechanic, the gardener - all experience pleasure in expressing that innate creative impulse in terms of beauty, in watching the gradual development of a picture, a building, plant, under the infinite care and manipulation of his own hands and the forms of usefulness and usefulness.

I plant a garden because of this inherent desire to create something beautiful and useful. I love the warm, fecund earth and like to be close to it. Exercise in the sun and the open air is both wholesome and healthful. All the world acknowledges that there is nothing more beautiful than those flowing from their petals. No fruits or vegetables are so delicious as those grown by oneself in one's own garden.

Finally, gardening is a restful change from regular work, one of the most delightful of recreations and one of which one does not tire.
