at the Hall of Justice here. Police Corporal Jack Floyd is the official spanker, and rarely a day passes that he does not imprint his trademark on some incorrigible Chinese youth.
 Corporal Floyd, who because of the fierce aspect he assumes on punitive occasions, is also known as the "Mandarin of Chinatown," first entered his present profession about three months ago when a worried Oriental parent confided, "My boy, Sam, he no like go school. All-time him away. Take him juv'nile court—no good. No like juv'nile court. Sam jus' lun away some more. You spankee him Mistah Floyd." And Floyd did.
 So appreciative was the parent of Floyd's handiwork that he presented him with a canary bird in a picturesque cage. Today a dozen canary birds at the Hall of Justice testify that Floyd's business is expanding.

I saw Nedda off at the station with a little feeling of relief. I was sorry she had spoken as she did. It upset me. Little by little all these old friends of mine, all these old associations, were closing in around me, were undermining my ideals.
 Suppose I should adopt their cynical worldly point of view! What then? Suppose I should begin to think that the great things of life were the things that I had really renounced?
 I had been so sure love was everything. I was sure of that still. But the question was coming into my mind more and more insistently—did I have love?
 Sometimes I looked at Win impersonally, wondering about him, in the evenings we sat on the porch sometimes, more often in the little living room where Win read the papers and I read or sewed. I could see his profile when I glanced up. He was and he wasn't handsome. His skin had been wonderfully clear and alive when I first knew him, but the days indoors at the office and the evenings and nights indoors and in badly ventilated over heated places, had affected him as it had affected me.
 Even if you don't like being here, the fresh air and the quiet is doing you good," I said suddenly.
 "Oh, I feel all right, I always have." He gave a little impatient twist to his shoulders.
 I went on with my critical inspection. At some time in her married life every woman looks at her husband, not as though he were the man she was wedded to, or that she was sure she was going to love forever and ever but as she might look at some perfect stranger, some doubtful person on whom she bends a critical eye.
 The man who looks up to meet that sudden inspection should take care. For it may be the direct break between happiness and a gradually growing misery.
 But Win never looked up. He went on reading.
 He had an irregular profile, not a bad one. His hair was nice in the way it went back from his forehead his chin was not strong, though it was well shaved, it was decidedly weak looking. His mouth—it could be tender as I well knew. It could be hard too—and then he looked like his mother. His nice grayish eyes would have redeemed a face far less attractive than his, but I could not see the eyes now.
 He looked up, drawn by the magnetism of my gaze.
 "What's up, Connie?" he asked laying aside his paper.
 "Nothing," I answered. "I wish sometimes you—liked it better here. I don't like to see you bored and unhappy."
 Win picked up a cigarette and lit it.
 "I'm not dear," he answered gently. "I'm standing it much better than I expected. I think I must be vegetating."
 I began to laugh, the first free laugh for a long time.
 "You're not, you are relaxing," I cried.
 It happened that we had no guests the following weekend. Win and I spent a long Saturday morning working on the lawn and among the flowers and in the afternoon we went for a swim at the beach. Sunday came cool and delightful. We planned a tramp over the hills for the afternoon, and that morning we had breakfast out on the porch and I made muffins while Win made coffee.
 It was one of the nicest memories I have—that morning. But it ended at noon.
 For at noon a great car slid up to our gate and stopped. Win called into the house for me and I went out to see who the unexpected guests were. They were Gwendolyn, and a party of friends.
 "So sweet, such a dear little house, as cozy as a bird's nest." Gwen cried, holding out both hands to Win as she alighted. "Connie dear, how well you look! I really believe this agrees with you."
 We greeted the party and they all came in on the porch. Gwen was too enthusiastic.
 "See the child's eyes—bluer than heaven! You look so different from last winter. Will it make me as young and charming? I could even endure the country if it would make me so attractive."
 I turned to talk to the others. They were motoring to the Green mountains and ran out of their way to find our place.
 "Lost six times! You are not on any motor map I possess" Gwen cried. "Win, I haven't seen you for days, have I? Do you like it here?"
 "I hate it," Win answered, looking down into her eyes. They were standing a little apart from the group, but I could overhear and so could anyone who chose to listen.
 "Well, she may be making a mis-
