Amateur Glamour Girl

(By JOSEPH CHADWICK)

CHAPTER XIX

As Tonia watched Michael dancing with Sally and saw how oblivious he seemed to every one except the girl in his arms, she knew she was jealous. She no longer had any doubts that she had fallen in love with him.

She hit her lip. He had told her he was "off" glamour girls, yet he had instantly succumbed to Sally's charms in the belief that she was the glamorous Tonia Lane. Anger swept through Tonia.

Then, she saw Jim eyeing her with amusement. That brought bright color to her cheeks.

"You're in love with that fellow, Tony," he said. "Admit it."

"All right," she answered defiantly. "I am."

He was silent a minute, starting down at the table.

Then he said slowly, "I know how you feel—at last, I know."

Tonia laughed mockingly. "You, Jim? You, the cynic, who doesn't believe in love?"

He looked up and smiled. "A man can change. You see, I never before met a girl like Sally."

Tonia stared at him. Jim Kirby in love! She couldn't believe it. He had known hundreds of beautiful girls but had been immune to all of them. Though he had proposed to her, he had never professed to love her. Now, suddenly, he fell in love with this girl to whom she had loaned her personality—a girl who wouldn't have known the meaning of beauty and charm if she, Tonia, hadn't taken her in hand and made her over.

"Well, Jim, if that's the way you feel," she said, "you'd better watch out for Michael. Sally seems to be doing her best to get him into her clutches. If you love her, do something about it."

"For my sake—or yours?" he asked.

"For both our sakes," Tonia told him.

The music stopped and Michael brought Sally back to the table. Sally's eyes were bright, and her cheeks were flushed.

As she sat down, she said, "Mr. Shane has promised to take me on a visit to the airplane factory. Won't that be exciting?"

"Won't it, though?" Tonia murmured.

Jim said nothing. Michael was smiling. It was all too evident that he had got over his prejudice against glamour girls.

"Miss Lane, very much interested in aviation," he said.

"Indeed, I am!" Sally enthused. "There's something so fascinating about it."

Oh, she was clever, thought Tonia. She had found Michael's weak spot, his Achilles' heel, and if he wasn't careful, he was doomed.

The head waiter approached and spoke to Jim—said there was a man outside to see him. Jim excused himself and left the room.

When he returned, five minutes later, he was accompanied by a heavily built man with a fierce face. He introduced him as Mr. Halloran and had a waiter crowd another chair up to the table.

"Mr. Halloran is from a detective agency," he told Tonia. "He's going to keep watch over you so long as that fellow Donovan is loose."

The detective looked at Tonia coolly. He looked long and seemed to register her every feature in his memory.

"You'll be quite safe, Miss Martin," he said. "You won't need to worry. I've done this sort of job before."

Tonia smiled. "I feel better already."

"Mr. Halloran knows his job," said Jim. "He can handle any tough. He's an ex-marine." He turned to the detective. "You're armed?"

Halloran nodded, his left shoulder to indicate a holstered gun. He told Tonia that he'd not make himself obtrusive—that he'd keep in the background.

Then, he rose. "I've leave you folks now to enjoy yourselves, but I'll be near by."

As he moved off, Tonia said, "He makes me feel important."

Jim, reaching out to pat her hand, said, "You are important—Sally."

She was glad when the evening was over. It hadn't been pleasant for her. Michael had kissed her, but had seemed to regret it. Then, Sally had made her play for him and had done very well for herself. She had got a date to visit the airplane factory with him.

Then, she saw that the closet door also was open—and she knew that she had left that door closed.

"Is that you, Sally?" she said, in a hoarse whisper.

A shadowy figure emerged from the closet and came toward her.

Tonia sat up—screamed. She screamed again.

"Shut up, you fool!" the man rasped.

He turned and moved swiftly toward the door, disappearing into the sitting room. A moment later Tonia heard the outer door close.
