THE TRIAL OF GEORGE GILLIAN

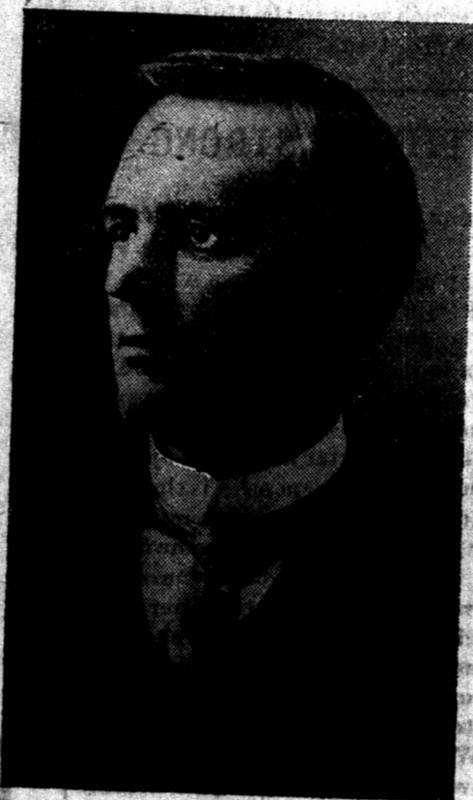

CONCLUDED YESTERDAY AFTERNOON

The Summerside Court Room Was Crowded to the Doors With Interested Spectators

CHARGES BY COUNSEL AND THE PRESIDING JUDGE.

Attorney General Peters Assisted By J. F. Whear Conducted the Case for the Crown. Neil McQuarrie K.C. for the Prisoner—Interest Intense in the Western Capital.

The Gillian trial which last June created such intense interest and which through the admission of a certain deposition given at the preliminary being used as evidence at the trial left grounds for a new trial after the prisoner had been sent to Dorchester penitentiary, closed yesterday evening about four o'clock. Those who gave testimony yesterday were John T. Crockett, Fred Gaudet, James Whelan,

NEIL McQUARRIE, K.C., Who conducted the case for the prisoner

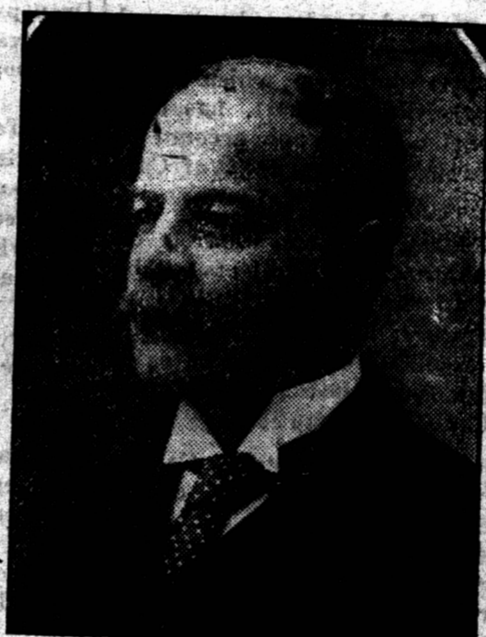

Thomas Kelly, Peter Gaudet, Patrick Mackey, W. D. White and Vera Clark for the Crown and Gillian for his own defence. The evidence all through the re-hearing of the case was unshaken from that given before the June Court except that it was not quite as full.

The prisoner Gillian on the stand was subjected to a severe cross examination on the part of the Attorney General, but comparatively little new was brought out. Gillian told the story of the affair as he did in June showing where he had been often addressed by Graves who had on different occasions threatened his life and at this time had accosted him as he (Gillian) thought with the intention of carrying out that purpose. The prisoner made the assertion firmly and upholdingly that he drew the pistol on Graves, with no other motive in the world but to frighten him. He remembered of firing the first shot which he said was not teen, and innocent and guilty on either side, charging the jury that if they come to the conclusion that Gillian stood on a doubtful ground they were bound to give him the benefit of that doubt. He summarized the case briefly, arguing that circumstances justified and excused the homicide charge, took away the culpability of the homicide and rendered no offence against the law. He concluded with a strong plea to the jury not to stamp the prisoner with disgrace but to allow him to go home with his family.

Attorney-General Peters next addressed the jury. He referred to the officers of the Crown sending the prisoner up for murder and they still believe it murder—murder most foul. The jury had nothing to do with what Gillian must suffer. The laws are made to safeguard society. He referred to Graves being drunk which should be a reason for Gillian to keep away from him; also to Graves clinching Gillian and bumping his head on the door which did not injure the prisoner very much. He reviewed the affair from beginning to end and asked the jury if there was any doubt of the facts as given by fourteen witnesses for the Crown.

Both addresses were comparatively short but able and impressive. Judge Fitzgerald then charged the jury. They must discharge their minds of anything in connection with the former trial. It was not necessary to go into details of the evidence which was uncontradictory. The affair was undoubtedly caused by Graves himself. The prisoner had come to aalter on to transit business, and if he had not met Graves we would not be here today on the case. The facts are simple. Graves assaulted the prisoner, they had a scuffle which ended without serious damage to the prisoner. It was mid-day and when cries for help would be answered. The drunken man was desirous of fighting everyone. Gaudet could easily have fought with him but showed his good sense by keeping clear. Gillian and Graves appeared desirous of meeting each other. The first shot struck Graves, he doubled up. His Lordship said he never listened to evidence, which suffered so little from cross-examination. You just got what each one saw, said he to the jury, all the main features were the same. His Lordship explained his own position in the case and did not wish to influence the jury one way or another, as aimed at him but did not know anything about the second shot and did not have any knowledge of jumping on Graves. He remembered little after the first shot was fired. He heard after he had gone home and not before, that Graves was dead. It was then that he gave himself up. Just before leaving the stand Gillian said that he thought an injustice had been done him in not having all the witnesses which were in the court testify.

Mr. McQuarrie then addressed the jury. He said the case was largely a question of justification. He referred to the gravity of the charge which was liable to send the prisoner to penitentiary for life. Every man charged with crime is entitled to every reasonable doubt. The Crown sent this man up for murder and after only hearing one side of the case the Grand Jury said it was not murder and modified the charge making it manslaughter. He explained the difference between culpable and excusable homicide, the latter as being no offence against the law. He drew two parallel lines illustrating doubtful ground be-
