Equine Dentistry

That horses' teeth need as much if not more attention than any other part of his anatomy is a fact that did not dawn upon the minds of horsemen until a comparatively short time ago. Horses' teeth are subject to all the afflictions of those of the human being, but for all these there is a remedy and a treatment, though the veterinarian pursues a different course than the doctor of dental surgery. The functions of the teeth are to bite off and grind the food, and with the aid of the tongue and cheeks to mix it with the saliva. Therefore, any trouble with the teeth interferes with mastication and indirectly with digestion. Soon the animal takes on an unhealthy appearance and the owner begins to wonder what ails the horse. After watching him closely and noticing him grow thinner day by day, he at last makes up his mind to try the effect of some well-advertised brand of condition powders that are guaranteed to cure any of the diseases of the horse. After using the powders and seeing no improvement in the animal's condition he is convinced that the cure for his horse, and he decides to get rid of him before he dies, therefore he forms the acquaintance of some horse trader whom he would like to beat. When his friend, the trader, sees the horse he is not long in finding out what ails him, but as it is not his business to call the owner's attention to the condition of his horse's teeth, he quickly makes a trade on external appearances, receives a valuable animal and a few dollars to boot for one that is worthless. And here the owner in blissful ignorance, while he goes on his way rejoicing. The trader soon has the trouble with the teeth remedied, and within a few weeks the horse regains his old life and vivacity. But not all the horses that suffer with their teeth are lucky enough to fall into the hands of a man who knows what ails them. Many of them are allowed to linger on until death relieves, while others supposed to be affected with glanders or some other incurable disease are destroyed. The most common trouble met with in horses' teeth, and one not found in the human beings, is that which is caused by the growth and wear of the molars. The upper molars overlap the lower set, and owing to this peculiar construction, the outer edge of the upper and the inner edge of the lower teeth gradually become worn to such a sharpness that the tongue and cheeks are often badly lacerated. The removal of these sharp points is called floating. This is done with a file or cutter, some veterinarians using both. Floating of teeth is carried on to a great extent nowadays, especially in the cities. That horses are more often troubled with fractured teeth than in the human being is due to the fact that they must subsist upon a less easily masticated quality of food, which, to make the matter worse, often contains gravel, nails, etc. Besides this, external violence may be put down as the cause of no small number of fractured teeth in the horse. Very little can be done with a fractured tooth except to extract it. Carious teeth are not very often met with in the horse except as the result of fracture. They are by no means as common as in the human race. Carious teeth sometimes set up an irritation that extends to and causes swelling of the surrounding parts. The bone and soft tissues in the neighborhood of the diseased tooth becomes affected, and gives rise to a discharge, which renders the breath of the animal horribly offensive. When the affected tooth is situated in the upper jaw there is a nasal discharge, when situated in the lower jaw it may discharge into the mouth or under the jaw. In either case the tooth must be removed. When one of the molars has been removed the tongue that used to come in contact with it gradually grows longer and longer, until finally it begins to cut the gum in the place where the other one was removed from. These abnormally long teeth should be cut down to their natural length about every two years. In horses, like other animals, is provided with two sets of teeth, temporary and permanent. During the shedding of the temporary teeth the animal's mouth should be looked after, as some of the temporary teeth, on account of not being properly shed, may interfere with the growth of the permanent ones. It sometimes happens that a horse that has been driven for years and that always was gentle and a very pleasant animal to drive will suddenly change and will not travel well, and will bother the driver by shaking its head or holding it to one side and moving its jaws. The driver wonders what has gone wrong with the horse. The chances are that if he examines the animal's mouth he will find out what causes the trouble. Besides the teeth being the principal agents employed in the process of mastication they are of peculiar interest to veterinarians and horsemen generally, as it is by means of the various changes taking place, the marks wearing away, etc., that the animal's age is ascertained. It is very hard to tell a horse's age correctly and to a day by the appearance of the teeth, but to the experienced eye they furnish satisfactory indications of an animal's age.

DEMOCRATS FEAR FOR RECIPROCITY

WASHINGTON, May 22.—Democrats in the house of representatives, having disposed of practically all their legislative program except the wool schedule, which is almost ready for action, are worried over the situation in the senate, the chief feature of which is the Canadian reciprocity bill. The house Democrats argue that they took the reciprocity agreement just as it came from the international conferees and the president and passed it as a matter of national policy without trying to encumber it or embarrass the administration with tariff riders. The farmers' free list bill, which followed it, they argue, was an affair of their own, and need not stand in the way of the reciprocity measure, for whose consideration the extraordinary session of congress was called.

Now they say that the Republican senate is juggling with the Canadian agreement. Should the bill embodying it be amended, and the Democratic house be called upon to consider it in an amended form, the house leaders fear they might be placed in an embarrassing position. One Democratic leader said today that there were two forces at work in the senate, to amend the bill, one force sincerely trying to strengthen the agreement and the other seeking to muddle affairs.

The Democrats are determined to take some action on the bill. A virtual ultimatum from the house to the senate leaders that the senate must also vote one way or another, on the farmers' free list bill and the wool bill which is passed in the house, is regarded by some as a sort of whip to hasten the senate along on the reciprocity measure.

House leaders are gratified that they are out of the woods on the wool question. The ways and means committee's decision is that the regular wool schedule will not place raw wool on the free list, but will cut the existing rate very materially, from 11 cents a pound to 5 to 6 cents a pound or its equivalent in an ad valorem duty.

Advocates of free wool in the committee were urged to yield by Speaker Clark, Majority Leader Underwood, chairman of the committee, and other conservative leaders, after a complete canvass of the states. Democratic leaders in each state delegation were called in. The revenue situation was explained to them. They were told that it was an impossibility to cut off with one sweep the $21,000,000 in revenue from raw wool and were asked to poll their delegations. This they did, with the result that the advocates of a revenue on raw wool were supported by a majority in every state delegation except New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts. In the states named the free raw wool advocates were largely in the majority. New York stood 18 to 4 in favor of New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts was almost unanimous for free raw wool. But in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, all the far western states, Texas and other far western states, with Democratic representation in congress, revenue tariff was supported. Hence the surrender in the committee by the free raw wool leaders.
